But when it comes to the perils of the street, Chicago must give way to New York. In 1908 the street and elevated railroads and the subways of the metropolis alone killed 444 persons and wounded 35,060. As all the roads combined carried 1,300,000,000 during the year, this was a death or an injury for every 36,615 passengers. Autemobiles killed 42 and injured 109.

SAVED BY A PANTHER.

Governor Jennings of Indiana used to tell a story of his early electioneering days in which he said that a panther may be a good temperance lecturer. Col. W. M. Cockrum repeats the story in his "Pioneer History of Indiana." The incident happened when Governor Jennings was traveling over the thinly settled hills of Dearborn County, electioneering for Congress.

He met a man with whom he was well acquainted, by name, Tom Oglesby, who was just getting over a protracted debauch. Jennings began asking Tom about his political views. The half-sober fellow looked at him and said:

"Jen, don't you think a man just out of a panther fight ought to be electioneered in a different manner from this? I am just from the grave. I was awakened a little while ago by a panther putting leaves and grass over me. It kept this up until I was entirely covered. I lay still for a while and then raised up and found the panther gone. I knew I was in danger, so I took my gun and climbed into a tree to see what the panther intended to do.

"In a short time I heard her coming, and she had her kittens with her. Every few steps she would jump as if catching something, and the little ones would go through the same maneuvers. She kept this up until she got near to the bed of leaves she had covered over me, and then made a spring on the pile. She looked just as I felt when I found that I was covered up for dead. She then started in to investigate the cause of my disappearance, and before she located me I shot her."

Jennings, after hearing this, said: "Well, Tom, I believe I should treat you as one from the dead, and that you should begin your life from this point. We were schoolboys together; I know you are a capable civil engineer and well-educated, and if you will cease drinking I will see that you have a good positoon on the surveying corps."

Tom Oglesby did quit drinking. Jennings was elected, and kept his promise to his old friend, who became one of the well-known engineers of the United States.

UNIQUE FLYING MACHINE.

Inventor Would Use Team of Wild Eagles to Run Airship.

In these days of successful flying machines it is interesting to note some of the curious methods of aerial navigation heretofore proposed. In United States patent granted May 17, 1887, to C. R. E. Wulff, and now expired, was shown a new use for the American eagle. Instead of being allowed to pose in lofty independence as our patriotic emblem, this utilitarian inventor has put him to work. A team of live eagles, each hitched up in special harness, was connected to a balloon as shown in the illustration, and formed a means of controlling and directing the flight of the balloon. This motive power was capable of indefinite radius of action and all the aeronaut had to do was to keep his team of eagles headed in the direction he wanted to go, which was done by a turntable arrangement to which the eagles were secured by their harness. The inventor in this case was a Frenchman and his invention was patented in France before it was patented in the United States. This may account for his lack of respect to our national bird.—Popular Mechanics.

PROPELLED BY EAGLE POWER.

A Pathetic Comment.

Unemployment is the ghost that haunts England just now, and it brings hunger as the chief in its train of miseries.

On the occasion of the opening of Parliament, as the procession—headed by the King in his royal robes, and the Queen in a black gown embroidered with gold and silver, a robe of ruby velvet bordered with gold and lined with miniver, a Honiton veil fastened to her hair by a diamond ornament, and the famous Cullinan diamond blazing on her breast—as the procession filed out into the street, a certain workman, mounted on the shoulders of another, caught a glampse of the King's round, smiling face.

"'E do look well fed, 'e do," said the man.

He spoke without rancor. He was not trying to be humorous. But he spoke from the depths of a complete understanding, and those who overheard him were suddenly alive to the exigency of the problem of the unemployed.

TIGER WHIPS A LION.

While an audience of 1,500 people was in the hall of a Coney Island animal show a lion and tiger started fighting, and before they could be separated the hind quarters of the lion had been so mangled by his striped antagonist that he had to be shot. The act which was being shown required seven lions and two tigers, and was considered a very daring feat on account of the enmity of the great jungle beasts. At every performance they snapped and snarled at each other, but had always been held in check by the trainer; on this occasion, however, he turned his head for an instant, and in that inconceivable time the lion saw his chance and sprang upon the tiger, after which, in spite of efforts to part them, they fought until both were helpless.

Hunting Grounds for Naturalists.

Those who are curious about birds may spend time to great profit in looking at the poulterers' shops when game is in season. There they will find many rare and even valuable specimens that apparently have been thrown into the hamper by the man who shot them on the chance of his receiving something from the London dealer. A very good museum of stuffed birds might be got by simply purchasing those that through ill luck have found their way into Leadenhall market.—Country Life.

A Tragic Episode.

"Why is Ethelinda crying so bitterly?" asked the fond mother.

"It's my mistake, as usual," answered the penitent father. "I went and ate up the things she made at cooking school instead of saving them to show to visitors."—Washington Star.

Stories of Cradles.

Some Historic Ones Used by Royalty and Others that Cost Fortunes

All sorts and conditions of people look upon the inhabited cradle as the most delightful object in the family circle. Consequently, the world and his wife perused with deep interest a paragraph in the newspapers which gave details of the cradles used by the heir to the throne of Holland, says "The London Globe." These are three in number, each of them a work of art. The one given by The Hague is of round, trellislike woodwork in white and gilt. Twelve thousand hours of work have been given by thirty-four lacemakers to make the lace of which the hood is entirely made, while the rest of its accessories are of a luxurious description. Amsterdam has also presented a cradle of rosewood, with silk curtains; but, although it is stately, it is not considered equal to The Hague cradle. The third tiny bed, however, is surrounded with the halo of romance; for it is the one that was used by Queen Wilhelmina herself, and this is the cradle which will be most occupied by the little stranger.

But although the trio of cradles are handsome homes of sleep for the royal babe, their get-up does not put in the shade the cradle exhibited at the Paris Exhibition of 1900. This was the one used by Napoleon II, and was designed by M. Prud'hon, its total cost being £240. But there is to be seen in the French capital a still more historic cradle—the one occupied by the ill fated Prince Imperial. It is in rosewood, with old silver and bronze ornamentation. At the head is a statue, in old silver, of the City of Paris, holding over the pillow an imperial crown in gilded bronze. The pillow is of white satin, with the gold embroidered letter "N" thereon. This infant's bed was presented to Paris by the ex-Empress Eugenie, and it was originally given to her by the people of the same city.

The cradle, too, which Rome presented to the King and Queen of Italy, on the occasion of the birth of their first child, was a magnificent work of art. The supports of the cradle proper are in gilded bronze, the cradle itself being in silver. At the head is a column ornamented with Roman trophies, surmounted by a figure of Rome, with a crown in her hand, while on the inside is the wolf of the Capitol. Opposite at the foot, is a female figure, the genius of the House of Savoy, the wings distended as though to protect the child, and grasping in her hands the arms of the House of Savoy and Montenegro. The figure of Rome is over eight feet in height being upheld by four lions, which are connected by the arms of the twelve districts of Rome.

A still more interesting cradle to British people was the one shown at the International Exhibition of 1851—for it was the royal cradle prepared for the use of the infant Prince of Wales (now Edward VII). It is of boxwood, two feet wide and two feet ten inches long, the design being symbolical of the royal houses of England and Saxe-Coburg and Gotha. In the centre of one end is the armorial bearing of Queen Victoria, surrounded by foliage, flowers and birds. On the rocker beneath is seen the head of Nox, the Goddess of Night, represented by a sleeping figure. At the back of the head of the cradle are the arms of the Prince Consort. On the other rocker is the head of Somnus, the God of Sleep. In the interior of the head of the cradle are guardian angels, and above is the royal crown embedded in foliage. The friezes at the sides of the cradle are made up of roses, poppies, foliage, butterflies and birds, while beneath them rise a variety of pinks.

Another cradle of great historic interest occupies as honored place among the many treasures possessed by Lord Salisbury at Hatfield House. And that it is worth its weight in gold is apparent from the fact that it was occupied by Queen Elizabeth in her infancy. When Queen Victoria and Prince Albert visited the ancestral home of the Cecils in 1846. Her Majesty was greatly interested in the crib of her illustrious predecessor, and when, about 1900, Lord Salisbury presented her with a miniature reproduction of the cradle in silver, she received it joyfully. The model is a beautiful and costly piece of workmanship, about one-fourth the size of the original, which, although now somewhat fragile, was especially brought to town for the purpose of securing a perfect copy. When its owner found that this ancient cradle had begun to be damaged through visitors rocking it, he had the rockers removed.

Probably the most expensive cradle ever constructed was the one made to the order of a certain financier whose name for a long time figured largely in the newspapers. When the South African Rand boom set in some ten years or so ago, this gentleman found himself in possession of a very big paper fortune. Seemingly anxious to get rid of it as soon as possible, he went to a London firm and had a cradle made at a cost, it is said, of no less than £15,000 ($75,000). Not long after the cradle was delivered its owner's speculations went awry, and when he had to leave his mansion through the importunity of his creditors, the cradle accompanied his wife into apartments. As no purchaser was forthcoming to buy the cradle intact, it was broken up, the resulting gold and gems realizing nearly half of its original cost. It became a standing joke in the city that the fallen financier was literally living on the cradle.

COST OF CARAVANING.

Few But the Idle Rich Can Afford It as an Amusement.

The Caravan Club of Great Britain and Ireland has just held its second meet. According to the secretary of the club it is, as a rule, rich people who take to caravaning, at least to caravaning for amusement. A recent addition to the membership is a woman who said she has eight motor cars. She was tired of rushing about and wished to try ambling for a time.

It is natural that caravaning should attract well off rather than ill off people, for however great economy is practiced there must always be the initial cost of a van (which is still not less than £60 to £80, without fittings and furnishings), the hire and keep of a horse, besides food, which can often be bought from farmhouses and need not of course be at all relatively expensive.

If the horse is stabled there are tips to grooms. Some one who had spent many week ends caravaning estimated that for three or four persons the cost of a week end worked out at about 15s. per day, everything included, but that caravaning for several weeks or a month or two worked out more cheaply.

An excellent plan for one thinking of taking up caravaning would be to buy a van second hand, which may sometimes be done. There was a beautifully fitted up one at the meet this year for sale second hand for £75. It had a stove or range and all sorts of conveniences and contrivances for carrying many comforts in little space and could not have been built for less than several hundred pounds.

To be able to supply accurate information to members of the club as to facilities for caravaning in the different counties the club secretary prevails upon as many caravaners as possible to send him printed post cards, with certain particulars filled in where blanks are left. These give the name of the district pitched at, details as to water supply and civility received and also state whether the pitch was charged for and whether there were people willing to let horses for caravans. The particulars received are classified under counties and members, but members only—for the club subscription is only 5s a year—are allowed on application to have the benefit of them.

Surrey, Kent and the home counties generally are the favorites among caravaners, though many seem to have been about Lincolnshire. This year several members have taken their vans to France and are going about Brittany. How they got the vans past the customs and what they had to pay will be known when they return. Evidently, however, there is no insuperable difficulty about getting a van into France. Brittany is an inexpensive district and the peasants very civil. The address of the Caravan Club is now 358 Strand, London.

LAST OF THE STAGE COACHES.

Used for Carrying Passengers in Early Days of Texas.

After standing in the alley west of Patterson's livery stable since 1873 the stage coach San Houston was torn to pieces recently and the timber cast in a waste heap. The Sam Houston was the victim of city legislation, it having been ordered moved from the alley, but being in such a dilapidated condition it could not be moved. The coach was torn to pieces and another relic of the early Texas days has passed into history.

If the old stage coach could talk it could tell of some hair raising events that would probably make the "blood and thunder" stories look like thirty cents Mex. It made its first run between Austin and Brenham in the year 1841, when Texas was filled with Indians and bad men. Six and eight mules were driven to the old coach six being driven in good weather and eight in muddy weather.

In its day the Sam Houston was the scene of many a fight and holdup. The wood was marked in numerous places by bullet holes, which were all that remained in history of many of the flights in which the coach was the centre of battle. Guards were always carried along with the coach in the early days to prevent Indian attacks and holdups by bad men who wanted to rob the mail.

Some time ago a movement was started to have the Sam Houston preserved as a historic relic of early Texas days, but the move failed to bear fruit and now it is too late.

The Sam Houston made its last run from San Antonio to Austin in 1873. It was abandoned and had to get out of the way, for the railroad took its place, and now it had to be taken out of the alley because it was deemed unsightly and in the way.—Austin Statesman.

Lysander Hears Things.

Whenever Lysander John Appleton is on the lounge and shuts his eyes his folk imagine he is asleep and begin to tell things. He learned recently while trying to rest that his wife had charged a $25 hat to him, for which she was paying on the instalment plan out of the money supposed to go for the table. The shock almost made him open his eyes. He also learned that his wife was conniving with Daysey Mayme in a love affair of which he disapproved. "Your father," said Mrs. Lysander John, "is an old fogy." Lysander John advises all men who seek happiness to take their naps at the office. It is his experience that women folk can never wait till a man is sound asleep in their desire to begin enjoying themselves by telling things.—Atchison Globe.

A Determined Violet.

An ancient homestead in Woodstock, Conn., shelters under its threshold an interesting freak of nature. Between the house and its huge old doorstep is a narrow crevice filled with cement. In this hard and seemingly forbidding environment a fine flourishing English violet plant awakens much wonder and admiration. With apparently no encouragement this brave little plant yearly puts forth fresh leaves and sometimes as many as ten fragrant flowers bloom at once.—Country Life in America.

TO LIVE FOREVER.

Thomas Edison has perfected a storage battery which he says will last indefinitely and revolutionize the present propelling power.

Prof. Munyon says it is only a question of time until a remedy is discovered that will supply the waste of the human body, so that one may live on almost indefinitely, barring accidents. This seems almost too good to be true, but nothing seems to be impossible in these days when we consider the flying machine and the wireless telegraph.

Prof. Munyon has certainly revolutionized the practice of medicine. He does not believe in building hospitals for consumptives. He says that consumption can always be traced to a cold. Cure a cold and you prevent consumption. His Cold and Cough Remedy will break up almost any form of a cold in a few hours and positively prevent Bronchitis and Pneumonia. To convince the medical world and people in general of the truth of his claims he has distributed millions of vials of the Cold Cure, absolutely free, from the leading newspaper offices throughout the country, and the cures that have been reported from its use have been most astonishing. These little sugar pellets contain no opium, morphine, cocaine or any harmful drug. They seem to relieve the head, throat and lungs almost immediately.

In order that no one may be deprived of this remedy he has placed it with all the druggists throughout the United States for the small sum of 25 cents, or sent postpaid on receipt of price, and with each bottle he gives this guarantee: "If Munyon's Cold and Cough Cure does not do all that is claimed for it, I will refund your money."

There are four advantages in taking Munyon's Remedies. First, they are absolutely harmless. Second, they are pleasant to take. Third, they relieve almost immediately. Fourth, they cost nothing unless they give satisfaction.

What Ailed Daysey Mayme.

Daysey Mayme Appleton was reading a newspaper last night when suddenly she gave a scream and fell to the floor in a dead faint. Now, according to the looks and tradition Daysey Mayme fainted because she read the announcement of an old sweetheart's marriage or death (and it would turn out afterward, according to the books and tradition, that he was a cousin of her old sweetheart by the same name). But real life is so unlike the books and tradition. Upon being revived Daysey Mayme related that she saw hosiery advertised for 27 cents that she had paid 35 cents for the day before.—Atchison Globe.

STEADILY GREW WORSE.

A Typical Tale of Sufferings from Sick Kidneys.

Mrs. L. C. Fridley, 1034 N. Main St., Delphos, Ohio, says: "Five or six years ago I began to suffer with kidney trouble and grew steadily worse until my health was all broken down. For weeks I was in bed and could not turn over without being helped. My back was stiff and painful, I was tired and languid, and when I was able to get around I could not do my work. The first box of Doan's Kidney Pills helped me so much that I kept on using them until rid of every symptom of kidney trouble. During the past three years I have enjoyed excellent health."

Too Expensive.

It is an elementary although a genuine kind of humor that prompts a man to make a ridiculous remark in a serious manner. The fun increases if the remark is taken at its face value. A case in point is that of a gentleman who, according to a writer in the Twiggs County Citizen, was talking to a crowd on the street about shingling a house.

"The old rule," he said, "was to allow six inches of the shingle to show to the weather, but that is too much. You really oughtn't to let more than four inches show."

Some wag asked in a matter-of-fact voice:

"How would it do not to let six show?"

"I've seen roofs made that way," replied the other, not thinking, "but it takes a great many shingles."

Another Operation Avoided.

Chicago, Ill.—"I want women to know what that wonderful medicine, Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound, has done for me. Two of the best doctors in Chicago said I would die if I did not have an operation, and I never thought of seeing a well day again. I had a small tumor and female troubles so that I suffered day and night. A friend recommended Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound, and it made me a well woman."—Mrs. ALVENA SPERLING, 11 Langdon St., Chicago, Ill.

Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound, made from roots and herbs, has proved to be the most successful remedy for curing the worst forms of female ills, including displacements, inflammation, fibroid tumors, irregularities, periodic pains, backache, bearing-down feeling, flatulency, indigestion, and nervous prostration. It costs but a trifle to try it, and the result has been worth millions to many suffering women.

VOICES OF THE WIND.

The wind, when first he rose and went abroad
Through the waste region, felt himself at fault,
Wanting a voice, and suddenly to earth
Descended with a wafture and a swoop,
Where, wandering volatile, from kind to kind,
He wooed the several trees to give him one.
First he besought the ash; the voice she lent
Fitfully, with a free and lashing change,
Flung here and there its sad uncertainties;
The aspen next; a fluttered frivolous twitter
Was her sole tribute; from the willow came,
So long as dainty summer dressed her out,
A whispering sweetness; but her winter note
Was hissing, dry and reedy; lastly the pine
Did he solicit; and from her he drew
A voice so constant, soft and lowly deep,
That there he rested, welcoming in her
A mild memorial of the ocean cave
Where he was born.
—Henry Taylor.

CINDERELLA

"I can't afford to send you to college, Muriel," said Mr. Ponsonby, addressing his youngest daughter.

"Very well, father," Muriel replied.

She had always felt certain that when she was old enough she would not share the lot of her three sisters.

Her reason for so feeling remained in the fact that she usually had to take what her brilliant sisters left. She was always kept in the background.

Gwendoline, Marguerite and Delicia set great store by their literary evenings. Sometimes Muriel would creep in unobserved and listen eagerly to the conversation.

One night the Ponsonby girls had secured a star in Richard Vivyan, R. A., the most popular and successful artist of the period. Dick Vivyan took matters very easily; success had not spoiled him in the least. Dick was growing bored, and then he suddenly saw Muriel seated in a corner gazing steadfastly at him. Their gazes met; a wave of color spread over Muriel's face, and she instantly became engrossed in a magazine that was lying in her lap.

"Awfully well reproduced, isn't it?" said a voice suddenly.

Muriel started, and glanced up to see Dick Vivyan's smiling face.

"They get them up sometimes to look better than the originals," Vivyan went on in cheery tones.

Then Muriel realized that the magazine on her lap was open and showing two full-page reproductions of well known pictures.

"I should not like to be the artist whose works would gain in such a manner," said Muriel seriously.

"How is it I have never met you before?" asked the artist. "I often have met your father and sisters."

"Oh, you see—er—I stay at—that is, I look after the house!" replied Muriel nervously.

"Of course, just like a man to forget that, isn't it?" Vivyan remarked. To himself he said, "Cinderella." Then he calmly sat down beside her and began to chat in the most natural manner. Muriel was dreadfully shy at first, but Vivyan so interested her that she forgot her nervousness and prattled away gally.

Gwendoline made her way to Muriel's side and touched her on the shoulder. The girl started up, and when she saw her sister she flushed guiltily.

"Pardon me interrupting you, won't you?" Gwendoline said to Vivyan, smiling graciously. "But my little sister is required upstairs. Aren't you, Muriel dear?"

The look which accompanied the endearing term suggested volumes to Vivyan, who saw through the little byplay.

"Good-night, Mr. Vivyan!" Muriel said tremulously, timidly holding out a slender hand.

"Good-night, Miss Ponsonby! I'm awfully glad to have met you."

He watched Gwendoline shepherd Muriel out of the room, an expression half whimsical, half annoyed on his face.

"Poor little girl!" he thought. "Regular case of Cinderella."

On the following morning a note arrived from the young artist. It ran as follows:

"Dear Mr. Ponsonby—I want to ask a great favor of one of your daughters. I am at my wits' end for a suitable model for my new picture, and I should be awfully glad if you could help me out. I will call on you at about 11 o'clock to-morrow morning. Yours sincerely,

"RICHARD VIVYAN."

"Oh, father, how fine!" cried Delicia. "I wonder which of us he'll ask?"

"He means me, I think," remarked Gwendoline. "He was consulting me about the picture last night."

Delicia and Marguerite hurled freezing glances at their sister, sniffed and applied themselves viciously to devilled kidneys.

"We've had kidneys two mornings running," said Mr. Ponsonby irritably. He rang an electric bell.

Muriel came in presently, a pink overall over her morning dress, traces of flour on her shapely hands.

"Why on earth can't you be original, Muriel?" Mr. Ponsonby asked. "Kidneys two mornings running is intolerable."

Before Muriel could reply a clock on the mantelpiece chimed the three quarters.

"Good gracious," cried Delicia, "it's nearly 11! Mr. Vivyan will be here soon."

Immediately the three older girls hastened from the room to adorn themselves for the occasion. Muriel's face crimsoned at the sound of Vivyan's name, and her replies to her father's questions were somewhat disjointed.

"Mr. Vivyan, sir," announced a servant.

"Show him in here."

"Excuse this, Vivyan," Mr. Ponsonby said, indicating the breakfast table. "We're a bit late this morning. Don't mind if I go on, do you? Will you join me?"

"No, thanks; it'll spoil my lunch," said Vivyan dryly. "How are you this morning, Miss Ponsonby?"

He shook hands with Muriel just as the three elder sisters swept into the room, having dressed in under ten minutes, and feeling secretly annoyed at the rush.

Vivyan shook hands with them, comparing unfavorably their elaborate toilets with Muriel's pink overall and simple gown.

"I hope you don't think me presumptuous?" Vivyan said, adding, "you got my note, I suppose, Mr. Ponsonby?"

"Oh, yes! I'm sure one of my daughters will be only too charmed to sit for you, Vivyan. Take your choice, my boy."

He indicated Gwendoline, Delicia and Marguerite, who stood in a row and beamed on the artist.

Vivyan looked somewhat surprised.

"I think there is a misunderstanding," he said. "Didn't I mention Miss Muriel's name in my letter?"

"Muriel!" came a chorus of three trebles and a bass.

Muriel's face was crimson; her three sisters stared at her in an angry amazement. Mr. Ponsonby forgot to eat, he was so astonished.

COULD SOON DO WITHOUT HIS MODEL.

"Well, well," he muttered.

"Will Miss Muriel be so kind?" Vivyan asked.

"Certainly, my boy. Won't you, Muriel?" exclaimed Mr. Ponsonby.

"If I'll do," said Muriel shyly.

"Thanks ever so much," remarked Vivyan, with a sigh of relief. "Will an hour a day, as often as you can, be too much, Miss Muriel?"

"Oh, no."

"I should like to start to-day," went on Vivyan eagerly.

Three o'clock saw Muriel seated in an easy chair in Vivyan's studio.

That solitary hour each day speedily became a time that she yearned for. Never had she been so happy as she was during those sixty minutes. How slowly the hands of the clock seemed to go round whilst she waited for the time to start, and how swiftly that one hour sped by!

Vivyan, too, began to feel that there was another joy in that hour beside the joy of his painting. A strange thrill ran through him each time he put his hands on Muriel to arrange her posture. Every time he glanced at her from his canvas his heart beat more rapidly.

It seemed to him that he had never painted a picture at such terrific speed, and the fact that he could soon do without his model was looming up large. He invented all sorts of excuses to delay the picture, though never once during those precious hours did he behave except as the artist. The lover's part he sternly repressed, though he hungered to give play to it.

"You've finished now, Miss Muriel," he said, one day, laying down his palette with a sigh.

"Then you don't want me to pose for you again?" the girl asked, gazing up at him quickly and then drooping her eyes.

"No. Are you sorry? Do you like posing?" Vivyan asked eagerly.

"I have enjoyed it very much," replied Muriel simply. "It has been such a change to——" She paused uncertainly.

"I shall be sorry to lose my model," said Vivyan, watching the girl's face and wishing she would look up so that he could see her eyes and read the expression in them.

"I am glad you have found me useful," Muriel said.

"Oh, I've found so much more than that!" cried Vivyan, unable to check his desires any longer. "I've found new life, new hope, new everything in you, Muriel. I love you, dear."

He took her hand uncertainly; she did not withdraw it from his grasp.

"Do you care for me, Muriel?" he whispered eagerly.

"Yes," she said softly, lifting her head and gazing straight into his eyes, a strange mixture of solemnity and passion in her own.

"My darling!" He took her in his arms.—Pearson's Weekly.

TAXATION IN MEXICO.

Stamp Taxes on Nearly Everything—Railroads and Lotteries.

The commonest form of interior taxation (in Mexico) is that of the stamp tax. This imposes no really severe burden on those whom it affects. The mining interests protest vigorously against it, claiming that the $2,000,000 which they pay each year to the government is excessive and unjust. There are cases, it is true, where the government has exacted from mine owners a very large part of their profits, but in a general way the laws are looked upon as equitable and in the interests of the foreign capital by which mines must be developed. All sorts of legal documents, contracts, leases, and even the receipt which the landlord gives to his tenant, carry a stamp tax. Bank notes are taxed, marriage settlements pay a tax of 1 pesos for every $1,000 on donations, except for charitable purposes. Inheritances are taxed 1 pesos per $1,000 for transfers to direct descendants; 2 per cent to those from second to eighth remove, and 3 per cent to strangers. The railroads pay 2 per cent on all gross receipts within the republic, while there is a government revenue from every passenger who rides on the tramways in the cities or is jolted over the rough roads of the interior in a stagecoach. Lotteries have to give up 5 per cent on the value of their prizes. The annual revenue of $465,000 which the government received from the national lottery is one of the most pitiable forms of levy on a credulous and morally unstable people. Pulque, the lottery, and the bullfight are the curse of Mexico. They keep the natives poor. The effect of one is about as bad as that of the others.

In the State of Aguascalientes, says a correspondment, I came upon an agent of the lottery who made this statement: "In two years the average monthly receipts from the lottery tickets I sold were $200. In those two years the total amount of prizes I distributed represented a gross value of $100.

Mexico makes her postoffice and her telegraph lines pay. The yield of revenue from so-called "public services" and from investments in railroad and other corporations is nearly 10 per cent of the total national income of $48,630,500.

Anecdote of Sheridan.

Sheridan was at Winchester twenty miles away, when he heard the news. "As usual," he muttered, angrily. "The last trolley has just gone and I shall have to nag it."

Whereupon he sprang upon his horse and got to the rear in time to turn it into the front with a few well-chosen words.

Overoptimistic.

"Bliggins says he is determined to look on the pleasant phase of everything."

"Yes. But he is carrying that desire too far. He is getting so that the fancy penmanship on a mortgage or a promissory note commands his enthusiastic admiration."—Washington Star.

If Luther Burbank is so smart, why doesn't he grow watermelons that have handles on them to carry them by?

And many a man has piled up a fortune by minding his own business.

SORRY PRACTICAL JOKES.

Cruelties Supposed to Be Humorous Inspired by Evil Natures.

That was a poor sort of joke played by a New Yorker who inserted in a paper an advertisement advising that thirty able-bodied men could find employment at a certain address, the Indianapolis Star says. The able-bodied men and some whose attempts to appear able bodied were pathetic, flocked in numbers to the place. There they were informed by the proprietor of the shop that their services were not needed; that, in fact, he had inserted no advertisement. Evidently some person burdened with a peculiar sense of humor had been responsible for sending these men on their forlorn quest with the idea uppermost in his small mind that he was playing a good joke on the supposed employer. The joke, if it was a joke, worked completely. The shop owner was vexed and chagrined, and the footsore men turned sadly away.

The humor of the thing will be seen at once when it is understood that some of these men tramped wearily many blocks, only to meet rebuff, while others, not able to walk, spent for car fare the few pennies they had managed to pinch together for such an emergency. It meant wasted hopes for men already, some of them, near the shoals of despair. It meant a loss of faith in mankind.

It is unpleasant to think that such jokers exist, but it is none the less true that they are to be found here and there, an incubus on society. These are the persons who rock the boat, who point the loaded gun "in fun," who pin crape on the doors of the living, who anonymously insert false marriage notices, and they are all of them blood brothers to those who wag the tongue of slander. Most of such offenders give thoughtlessness as their excuse, but the real truth is that persons who do so offend are wanting in the milk of human kindness—they are of evil nature.

Legal Information

The liability as an insurer of a common carrier undertaking to transport live stock is held in Summerlin versus Seaboard Air Line R. Co. (Fla.), 47 So. 557, 19 L. R. A. (N. S.), 191, not to extend to any damage resulting from the nature, disposition or viciousness of the animal.

An assignee of a bill of lading as collateral security for a draft upon the consignee of property represented by it, which he discounts, is held in Mason versus Nelson (N. C.), 62 S. E. 625, 18 L. R. A. (N. S.), 1221, not to be liable for breach of warranty by the consignor in the sale of the property.

The derailment and overturning of a freight car in a train is held, in Henson versus Lehigh Valley R. R. Co., 194 N. Y., 205, 87 N. E. 85, 19 L. R. A. (N. S.), 790, not to be such evidence of negligence toward its brakeman as to cast upon it the burden of exonerating itself from the charge of negligence to absolve itself from liability for injury to him thereby.

One who, without paying fare, voluntarily attempts to ride in the cab of a locomotive at the invitation of those in charge of the train, is held, in Clark versus Colorado & N. W. R. Co. (C. C. A.), 165 Fed. 408, 19 L. R. A. (N. S.), 988, to assume the known hazards incident to such exposed position, and he is held not to be entitled to hold the railroad company liable for injury caused by the collision of the cab with a car negligently left on a side track so as not to clear the main track, where the negligence was not wanton, and no injury occurred to anyone else on the train.

One who, in constructing a railroad in a public street, rightfully leaves a loaded push car standing unfastened and unattended upon a track, is held, in Cahill versus E. B. & A. L. Stone & Co., 153 Cal. 571, 96 Pac. 84, 19 L. R. A. (N. S.), 1094, to be liable for injury thereby caused to a child not guilty of contributory negligence, who has been permitted to play upon it, where the car is on a grade down which, if it starts, it cannot be readily stopped, and the injury is caused by the child's being caught and crushed while attempting to stop the car after it has been set in motion down the grade.

MAN'S HAT BLOWN IN CAVE.

Draft Came from Opening and Cavern Is Revealed.

The loss of a hat and a search for it resulted in the discovery of another mammoth cave, which is expected to surpass in extent the famous Wind cave in the southern Black Hills.

The site of the new cave is in Pennington County, South Dakota, in the eastern foothills of the Black Hills, the entrance being on the ranch of Charles Maddock. The new cave was accidentally discovered by Mr. Maddock while walking about his ranch. Near the spot where the entrance to the cave was afterward discovered his hat suddenly blew off his head and disappeared. In following the direction taken by the hat the mouth of the cave was disclosed.

Explorations thus far have been interfered with by the presence across the explored passage of a wall of limestone rock, which has accumulated from the ceiling of one of the chambers.

It is a curious coincidence that the discovery of the new cave and that of the now famous Wind cave were identical in circumstances. Wind cave having been discovered many years ago by a cowboy, whose hat blew off and was drawn by a fierce air current into the entrance of what has since been known as Wind cave, which now belongs to the United States government and has been included in a national park, which is yearly visited by a great number of people.

GOOD ROADS

Good Road or Good Roads?

Shall it be a good road or good roads? questions H. H. Windsor in Popular Mechanics, and adds:

"The State of Pennsylvania appropriated $3,000,000 to be spent during the next two years in the construction of a good road from Philadelphia to Pittsburg and on to the Ohio State line. The distance to be about 360 miles, which makes the average cost per mile $8,300. Inasmuch as the route will doubtless follow to a large extent highways now in use, much of which is already fairly 'good roads,' the expenditure of such a sum, if honestly applied, can not fail of superior results.

"The plan, however, is to be regretted. In the first place it is not needed. There is not now, nor is there likely to be, any considerable amount of trans-State freight traffic for such a road. All classes of freights are being moved by the railroads at rates which make hauling on highways prohibitive.

"The cities and villages on the immediate route would, of course, be benefited, but at the expense of other portions of the State.

"As an example of high-grade road-building to the rest of the State it is of doubtful value, because of its very excellence. Few counties and fewer townships could or would feel able or inclined to duplicate it locally. On the contrary, on account of its cost, it places an argument in the mouths of those opposing the good roads movement calculated to create adverse opinion.

"Vastly better would be a distribution of this money on a basis, say, of $2,000 a mile, to such counties as would spend an equal amount of their own money. This would provide for 1,500 miles of excellent roads, as $4,000 a mile spent on present highways would make a really good road where road material is as abundant as it is in Pennsylvania. This is the plan which has been adopted elsewhere, and is found not only to stimulate the desire for good roads, but enables any and all parts of the State to be equally benefited."

A New Type of Road.

New Jersey is to experiment with a new type of road in Essex county, where the county engineer, James Owens, proposes to lay them in West Orange, Nutley, Belleville, Verona, Short Kills, Milburn, West Caldwell and other places. The State is to pay one-third of the cost of these new roads, each municipality one-tenth of the cost of the roads within its limits, and the county pays the balance.

Mount Pleasant avenue, West Orange, is to be the first scene of the new road trial. Telford pavement is to be used, under a new formula prepared by Mr. Owens, and he thinks that such a road will stand automobile traffic splendidly; and, while it will not be absolutely dustless, it will be less dusty than any road of a similar kind.

After the Telford blocks are laid, instead of using clay as a binder, liquid asphalt will be used. This has been successfully tried as a binder in connection with patent road formula, and, while it will add about 15 cents a square yard to the cost, it will be cheaper in the end. The foundation of the road will be constructed in the ordinary way, and chinked in the usual manner. Then a coating of some screenings will be applied and rolled. Next will come a 4-inch layer of broken stone and another thorough rolling. On top of this will be put a thin layer of screenings to fill the interstices; then the liquid asphalt will be put on hot in the proportion of one and one-third gallons to each square yard of surface. It will then be given from five to ten hours to penetrate, and then another coating of screenings and the road rolled again, and then it will be ready for use.

LOVES OF ELLIS ISLAND.

Many a Romance of Lowly Life Revealed When Immigrants Land.

In "The Loves of Ellis Island" you may find a theme to answer the eternal question of existence. You shall see the immigrants laugh and cry. Nothing more matters much. After many winding passageways they have come to the department marked by the sign on the wall, the "discharging division," says Mabel Potter Daggett in the Delineator. No name, that, for a place where the greatest wonder of the world flashes forth before your eyes. One would speak here only words that are soft and sweet.

Outside, just beyond reach, are dear ones whom the years and the ocean have rolled between. As they recognize relatives there is an exclamation, a cry in a foreign tone. They gesticulate. They call across the intervening space. They throw up hats. They wave handkerchiefs. And the line beyond, in more subdued agitation, waves back. The door is locked. It has to be. In their impatience some even now, the shaking the wire lattice. Some lean against it, their heads bowed on their arms in tears.

Meantime the red tape of the discharging division of the immigration service of the United States Department of commerce and labor measures off slowly, surely, safely. These new arrivals the government holds in its keeping. Before surrendering them, particularly women and children, it must be sure of their destination. Uncle Sam does not mean to let girls go wrong. Those who say they are relatives must prove it. "What is the woman to you?" is searchingly asked. And the answers to all questions of family history must tally with the information on the immigrant's landing card. Satisfied that all is well, the inspector gets down from his stool and turns the lock in the latticed door.

An old grouch is as good as a new one if you are merely looking for trouble.

BURNED AND ITCHED.

Eczema on Hand, Arms, Legs and Face—It Was Something Terrible—Complete Cure by Cuticura.

"About fifteen or eighteen years ago eczema developed on top of my hand. It burned and itched so much that I was compelled to show it to a doctor. He pronounced it ringworm. After trying his different remedies the disease increased and went up my arms and to my legs and finally on my face. The burning was something terrible. I went to another doctor who had the reputation of being the best in town. He told me it was eczema. His medicine checked the advance of the disease, but no further. I finally concluded to try the Cuticura Remedies and found relief in the first trial. I continued until I was free from the disease and I have not been troubled since, C. Burkhart, 236 W. CENTURY MARK TO BE OBSERVED BY DISCIPLES

When the Disciples of Christ, popularly known as the Christians, come to celebrate their centennial in Pittsburg next October they will show to the religious world the most remarkable growth and the advancement of any religious body of moden times.

One hundred years ago at Brush Run, Pa., there was a solitary church of these people with a membership of only 27. Today, such has been their marvelous growth, that they number over 1,330,000.

From the little church at Brush Run to a great body of people with over 11,000 houses in the United States and more than 1,000 in other lands, is a far cry, a long sweep and a great step.

From two men, earnestly "contending for the faith once for all delivered to the saints" in a little frame building, to a body of people with over 6,500 ministers ordained to preach the gospel, is a growth that must interest the student of causes and effect and be wondered at by those who have failed to grasp the significance of the plea which these brave hearted and strenuous hearted people have been making for the last 100 years.

Today the Disciples of Christ in the United States have a Bible school enlistment of a million, a church property worth $27,455,131, and educational institutions of all kinds and colleges to the number of 33, with an enrollment of students last year amounting to 7,658.

These facts must give the student of religious progress pause, and lead him to ask relative to the origin of this body of people.

The origin of this people is not veiled in obscurity. There are people living today who knew and talked with the "pioneers of the reformation," as the founders of the church are lovingly called. In Bethany, W. Va., lives today in a calm, quiet, serene old age the tenth daughter of Alexander Campbell, Mrs. Decima Barclay, who as daughter of her father, enjoyed with him the work of the beginning of the church. In Lexington, Ky., lives John McGarvey, president of the College of the Bible, who was a graduate of Bethany college, the college established by Alexander Campbell and enjoyed a long friendship of brotherly love and communion with him. There are hundreds of others, all through the length and breadth of our land who remember and were intimately associated with the founders of the reformation. Hence it comes that from these living oracles may be gathered the history of the origin of the people today who call themselves Christians, "not because they are the only Christians, but because they are Christians only."

One hundred years ago there was but little religious activity in the world. It was a rare thing for a young man to be actively identified with the church. Today more than 37 per cent of the young men of our large cities between the ages of 18 and 25 are not only members of the various churches but also actively working with them.

Religious thought was divided. Great churches contended relative to theological problems that had but little bearing upon the things of this world. They were more interested in the discussion of the conditions of the heavenly country to which they hoped to go than they were relative to making their own country heavenly.

They had failed to discover that the Bible was not a book of theology, but a book for practical living in this everyday world of ours.

They were more willing to dispute relative to the disposition of the body of Moses than they were to discuss the care of the body of the individual man here on earth.

They were rent in twain over problems interesting to students, but which meant but little in the way of social betterment for men living on this mundane sphere.

They made creeds their test of faith rather than a testimony to faith. Thoughtful men everywhere deplored this sad condition of affairs, but seemed powerless to find a remedy, much less apply the remedy when it should once be found.

It is true that Thomas Chillingworth over in England had declared that "God did not, and therefore man should not, enjoin upon man more than this, to believe that the Bible is the word of God and that it contains a safe and simple plan of salvation, for all who accept its teachings." But Chillingworth's teachings had made but little impress upon the world.

Can't Learn in School

When the stomach is out of order or the bowels constipated, a feeling of drowsiness and inactivity comes over the body. The brain won't think, and the body won't work. If it is a child who suffers in this way, it naturally can't learn well in school, as it has no inclination for study. Give the child a dose of Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin and you will soon find it wonderfully improved and ultimately cured. It is guaranteed to do what is claimed, and if you want to try it before buying, send your address for a free sample bottle to Pepsin Syrup Co., 119 Caldwell Bldg., Monticello, Ill. It is sold by all druggists at 50c and $1 a bottle. 39-1m

Messrs. Ridgill and Burns

Thousands of people have stomach trouble, constipation, indigestion, sick headache, etc., and don't know what to do for it. Perhaps the experience of Mr. Ridgill, postmaster at Bruceville, Tex., and Mr. Burns, Wabash R. R. engineer, Bement Ill., will suggest a method. Both of these men take pleasure in saying that they cured themselves with Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin. It is absolutely guaranteed to do what is claimed, and if you want to try it before buying, send your address for a free bottle to Pepsin Syrup Co., 119 Caldwell Bldg., Monticello, Ill. It is sold by all druggists at 50c and $1 a bottle. 39-1m

We all get fooled in time.

Everyone hates the "I am" man.

A theory works all right until you try it.

How much people enjoy their tongues!

We like warm weather. But it's easily overdone.

You can not afford to have things given to you.

The largest part of some people is the wishbone.

One of the funniest things in this world is a man hater.

We have yet to hear a barber speak well of a safety razor.

Men are always wondering how women keep their hair up.

Do some people ever talk about anything but the weather?

When you are acting unfairly, you are making enemies rapidly.

A man is always expected to speak well of woman and religion.

To want your own way is a very bad habit, for you will never get it.

Every man who works at all, works too hard to fool his money away.

What has become of the old-fashioned man who used to use musk?

While a man is watching his enemies, his friends get away with him.

There are very few sisters of limited means who do not pool their clothes.

There is a sort of person you hate, and there is no use trying to tolerate him.

Every woman likes to hear a man talk about his kin until she marries him.

You are very lucky if you can send a bill to a man without making him mad.

After all, there is nothing quite so funny as an amateur wearing a uniform.

Every owner of an automobile is disposed to fib when asked about his repair bill.

CERTAIN RESULTS

Many a Butler Citizen Knows How Sure They Are

Nothing uncertain about the work of Doan's Kidney Pills in Butler. There is plenty of positive proof of this in the testimony of citizens. Such evidence should convince the most skeptical doubter. Read the following statement:

W. S. Chapman, Cherry Street, Butler, Ind., says: "I have taken Doan's Kidney Pills procured from Phillips' drug store and they have always brought the best of results. I was subject to attacks of backache for several years and often when I stooped, sharp pains would suddenly catch me in the kidneys and make it almost impossible for me to straighten. This trouble was generally worse after I caught cold and at such times I was in great distress. When Doan's Kidney Pills were recommended to me, I at once began their use and in return for the benefit they brought, I am pleased to endorse them."

For sale by all dealers. Price 50 cents. Foster-Milburn Co., Buffalo, New York, sole agents for the United States.

ARE WEDDED IN CORDOVA

Mr. Charles T. Stevens and Miss Irene E. Anderson United in Wedlock

For several days Mr. Charles T. Stevens, the popular manager of the Frye Bruhn Co., at Valdez, has been pacing the streets of Cordova, casting longing glances seaward, and filling the vast expanse of the atmosphere with wireless messages directed to the steamer Northwestern. Irene E. Anderson was pacing the decks and sending swift-winged messages shoreward by the same medium to the impatient lover. As "All Things Come to Him Who Waits" so came the steamer out of the thick weather. The lateness, or rather earliness of the hour made no change in the program arranged by Mr. Stevens. Alaskans are superior to the conventions of hours and seasons. Only waiting long enough for the expectant bride to don the beautiful white wedding dress made by the loving hands of her sister, the young couple were driven to the home of M. S. Whittier, where, at 3:30 a. m., Rev. Dr. S. Hall Young pronounced the words that made them one. Mrs. Whittier had provided an elegant wedding supper, or breakfast, as you like to call it, and the happy company did not break up until the dawn showed Captain Lathrop the road for his bus to the Hotel Burke.

Miss Whiting and Mrs. Post prepared the bride for the ceremony. Mrs. Stevens is the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. B. Anderson, of Beverton, Ore. The young couple will make their home in Valdez. Our congratulations and best wishes.

Mr. Stevens is a son of Mr. and Mrs. Russel Stevens of this place, and has a large number of friends who will wish them the best there is in life.

VALVELESS GAS ENGINE

Invention of G. L. Crider---One Horse Size Has a Range of 600 to 3700 Revolutions Per Minute

After more than a year's thought and experimentation G. L. Crider has perfected a gasoline engine that is the slimpest yet made. There is not a valve, cog or cam in its construction, and but one small spring which is not an absolute necessity in its operation.

The engine is of the two-cycle type. Unlike other engines this one receives the charge in front of the piston instead of behind it. After the charge is received the piston in its forward movement drives the mixture through a side passage and to the rear of the piston forcing the burned gas out. The backward movement of the piston compresses the new charge which is exploded. The exhaust and receiving ports are so placed that the piston opens and closes them in its alternate movements.

Mr. Crider, who is a Wabash engineer, has a one-horse power motor set up and in operation in his shop at his home on Broad street. By the movement of a nicely adjusted lever he can change the speed of this little engine from 600 to 3700 revolutions per minute. Or by pulling the lever in the opposite direction the motion is reversed and the machine has the same range of speed.

This engine is so simple and so positive in its action that it seems impossible for it to get out of order. —Montpelier (O.) Leader.

Mr. Crider is well known by our readers, having been a resident of this place previous to moving to Montpelier.

TO LAY PLANS FOR CAMPAIGN

Temperance Element Getting Busy For Fight---New Wet Daily

(Courier)

To prepare for the local option campaign and election which will either put DeKalb county wet or on the dry list for two more years, the temperance workers of the city will hold a meeting at the Methodist church at eight o'clock this evening and will map out their plans for waging the battle against the return of the saloons.

The supporters of the saloons are not idle either and it is said that they too will put up a hard fight on their side of the question. Since the legalized liquor traffic was put out of the county by remonstrance, the wets claim, many voters who signed the remonstrance have regretted their move, owing to the undecreased consumption of liquor and the lack of public revenue therefrom, and will so express themselves at the polls.

The feature that is worrying the temperance element is the recent sale of the Waterloo Dawn to Ab Kelley. One of the dry leaders said this morning that he had been informed that Kelley intends to put out a daily and that he will take up the wet side in the fight. For this purpose, according to the informant, Kelley has imported an editor who had charge of one of the Hartford City wet dailies during the Blackford county option campaign and that the new daily will espouse the cause in the same manner that brought such disastrous results to the Blackford county drys.

Court House Talk

(From the Courier.)

Judge Bratton, after enjoying a day at the big festival, returned to his home at Angola, Thursday evening, where he will remain until Monday. The October term of the DeKalb circuit court will be resumed Monday and the judge will make up a calendar within a few days. Some rather important litigations are scheduled.

The treasurer's office at the court house has been about the busiest place in town since the opening of the festival, many farmers taking advantage of the opportunity to pay their fall tax installment. The office has been lined with people from morning until night.

The clerk's office, were it not for the appearance of marriageable couples at intervals, would have been a very desolate place during the past few days. Clerk Austin is, however, as busy as ever caring for his duties.

A communication was received from Fort Wayne by Sheriff Thomas Friday morning in which the officer was notified that one, Perry Baker, a railroader from Iowa, had escaped from the Allen county jail Thursday night. The man was being held on the charge of breaking into cars. How he made his escape was not told. The description of the fugitive is as follows: Height, 5 feet, 10¼ inches; weight, 142 pounds; slender build, dark eyes, short mustache, Roman nose and sideburns.

The judge has made up the trial calendar for this and next week, which is as follows: Monday, October 11, petition of E. M. McKennan, Garrett drain; Hathaway petitions to set aside default. Tuesday, October 12, closing issues; Wednesday, October 13, closing issues and divorce cases; Thursday, October 14, Lee J. Hartzell vs. Shaheen; Friday, October 15, Teutsch drain remonstrance by Lake Shore & Michigan Southern Railway company; Monday, October 18, State ex rel vs. Runnion, jury trial; Nora B. Paul vs. Sarah Trail, Collins estate, jury. Tuesday, October 19, Rena Van Haughton vs. Van Haughton estate jury; Edward Hoch vs. John Kruger estate jury. Wednesday, October 20, Allen Moge vs. Rohrbaugh et. al.; D. N. Myers vs. Kugler-Boltz, jury. Thursday, October 21, Mary Blomeke vs. David A. Baker, Capital Food company vs. William Curie, jury; State vs. Rodgers, jury. Friday, State vs. Rodgers, jury.

An English medical scientist of the theorist order, who believes that this gives him the right to repeal any of the Ten Commandments, states that profanity is a valuable escape valve and relieves a strain that is harmful to health. Yet statistics show that women, who, as a rule, refrain from blasphemy, are longer lived than men. The doctor will have to guess again.

When the disaffected of other lands are minded to continue here their disaffection and to rail and agitate and conspire against republicanism, just as they had done against monarchism, says the New York Tribune, we must regard their coming as an impertinent and offensive intrusion, which is permitted, if at all, not because of any legal or moral right of theirs, but through a carelessness or a self-confidence on our part which may be more complacent than prudent or patriotic.

Israel is coming into its holy of holies, from which it has been barred for many long and bitter centuries. As one result of the new regime in Turkey all religions are officially recognized on an equal basis, and at last the Jews are allowed to enter the site of their ancient temple at Jerusalem and there worship according to their creed. Since the destruction of the second temple by the Romans under Titus, in 70 A. D., no Jew has been permitted on the spot. For a dozen centuries Moslem soldiers, stationed at the gates, have slain or turned away all who sought to enter; and the devout Jews have had no other privilege than to weep and pray outside the walls. Within the past generation visiting Christians have been allowed, under guard and for payment of a fee, to enter the beautiful Mosque of Omaha, which stands where the great Temple of Solomon stood, and where Christ taught in its successor, which was erected after the return from the captivity. Beneath its lofty dome is the wonderful rock of numberless traditions, revered alike by Jews, Christians and Mohammedans. Late in July the Jews were allowed to enter and worship for the first time. So 1909 is a notable year in Jewish history, and the promise of the olden prophecy has come to pass.

"No man," said the late E. H. Harriman, "is absolutely necessary or even very important. If I did quit nothing would happen. This world is full of men ready to take the place of anyone. The fellow who takes hold where I leave off will go right ahead. Trains will run just the same, dividends will be earned as before; so it is with every man." The views thus expressed were not startlingly original, but coming from Harriman they showed that his head was not turned by his extraordinary success. He belonged to the common-sense school as opposed to the miracle-worker school, some of whose adherents would have ranked him as the greatest miracle-worker of his time. And the soundness of his judgment is proved by what has occurred since his death. Following the announcement of that event, the stock market was noticeably strong. In the ordinary course there will be short-lived sensations and changes in the prices paid for stocks. But it is plain that Mr. Harriman, with all his ability and all his power, was not the whole thing. In a discussion of the estimates of his wealth it is pointed out that while he held controlling interests in the larger corporations with which his name is identified he did not actually own them. His authority was by no means that of an absolute monarch, but was conditioned on his retaining the confidence of other capitalists. Standard Oil, Kuhn, Loeb & Co. and the National City Bank come to the fore again. However large the Harriman estate may be, a combination of interests more or less closely woven together is to determine the future of the so-called Harriman system. There must, of course, be an active manager at the head of the system, and he may acquire as much power and prestige as Mr. Harriman himself enjoyed. He will certainly be unfit for his job unless he possesses a strong will and exceptional ability and intelligence. But we may be sure that the miracle-worker school will be ready to acclaim him on slight provocation. For it must have its indispensable man. It will turn lightly from one to another and repudiate Mr. Harriman's declaration that no man is absolutely necessary. As for the sentiment that no man is even very important, it will look upon this as the worst kind of heresy.

SURGEON BUILDS NEW FACE.

He Also Provides Prolific Crop of Hair for Patient.

Stephen Calabro, 25 years old, of Quincy, were discharged from the Massachusetts General Hospital Saturday, literally with a new face and scalp, following a series of operations among the most remarkable in surgical history extending over a period of three years and done as a work of scientific interest by Dr. Charles A. Porter, of the Harvard Medical School.

Calabro, who was horribly burned and thought to be disfigured for life in a fireworks explosion in Weymouth in 1905, submitted himself for treatment at the Massachusetts General Hospital in March, 1906. His face, neck, scalp and arms were a mass of turtle-like skin that is known to the medical profession as chelyoid tissue. To-day he left the hospital with a new forehead, new eyelids, new cheeks, a new nose, a new chin, a new neck and, finally, a new head of hair the result of three years' treatment and unselfish devotion of Dr. Porter in the cause of science.

Calabro was given ether no less than 30 times. The operations consisted of skin transplantation and grafting. Much of the skin was taken from other parts of Calabro's own body, but his brother Thomas and other members of his family sacrificed portions of skin to aid their brother.

One of the greatest difficulties met with in the treatment of Calabro was the making of a new head of hair. Nearly the entire scalp had to be replaced, but this was finally accomplished, and now the young man has a prolific crop of hair "as good as new," which comes well down over his forehead.

Calabro has returned to his brother's home in Quincy, where he has a little farm. He intends, he says, to raise fancy poultry for the market.—Boston Dispatch to N. Y. Herald.

FIND THE AGE OF YOUR FRIEND BY THE MAGIC FAN.

If you wish to know the age of a friend—always supposing the friend not to be older than 31 years—just show him this picture of the "Magic fan" and ask him to tell you on which of the blades his age appears. Then the only thing you have to do is to add the numbers at the top of the blades indicated and you will know the correct answer. For instance, suppose your friend is 19 years old. The number 19 will be found only on the blades under 16, 2 and 1, the sum of which is 19.

A Wonderful Amazon.

Although not the largest or longest river, the Amazon is the most wonderful river in the world, with a mouth 150 miles in width, and with a force of water that repels, or at least overlays, the ocean to a distance of more than fifty leagues. Yet, in spite of the weight of the river, the tide makes its influence felt for 500 miles from the coast. The easterly trade winds blow almost invariably upward, so as to be ready to help the vessel against the adverse currents.

POLITICS OF THE DAY

Doesn't Hurt the Standpatters.

The standpatters who are raising an outcry against the new tariff commission admit thereby that the kind of tariff they have put into the Payne law will not bear investigation. They are so well satisfied with the plunder they get by means of that law that they want all details of its enactment forgotten. They fall into a rage when it is proposed to delve into the actual facts of our foreign and domestic trade.

But to the ordinary observer neither the commission itself, which President Taft appointed just before he started on his swing around the circle, nor the work which he outlined for it at the tail end of his Winona speech, need worry the standpatters. Interpreted in the light of what Mr. Taft said, the commission seems to have been intended, and doubtless will be used, as a stop-gap against further tariff legislation.

There is no guarantee that the members of the commission possess the high abilities that will be required to advise the President wisely in the delicate task of applying the 25 per cent tariff maximum, which goes into effect on April 1, 1910. They are Professor Henry C. Emory of Yale College, chairman; James B. Reynolds of Massachusetts, formerly Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, and Alvin B. Sanders of Chicago, editor and owner of the Breeders' Gazette. The Payne act appropriates $75,000 a year for their salaries and the employment of assistants.

President Taft proposes that they shall dig into the cost of production at home and abroad, scrutinize every item of the Payne tariff, including those on the free list, make a philosophical study of the effects of foreign tariffs on our export trade and of our tariff on our own trade and the trade of foreign countries, and compile it all into a tariff encyclopedia for his guidance and the guidance of the Republican party. The joker" which the insurgent Republican leaders will readily discover in Mr. Taft's plan is that he thinks it will take the commission until the end of his administration to find out enough about the tariff to teach the Republican party what kind of a tariff juggle it wants to put into its next platform. In the meantime he wants the Payne tariff left severely alone. The standpatters who kick against this program surely are hard to please.

But if it will take the commission three years to find out what the Republican party wants to do about the tariff, of what use can it be to him next spring when he has on his hands the job of applying the maximum tariff, with all its dangers of costly tariff wars? The maximum rates go into effect in every instance unless he takes affirmative action to arrest them.—St. Louis Republic.

Forcing the Tariff Issue.

President Taft's extravagant eulogy of the Payne tariff and his declaration that "party solidarity" must be preserved at whatever sacrifice, destroys the last hope that this country will ever get relief from the robbery of monopoly tariff legislation through the Republican party.

As long as party solidarity is paramount to the fulfillment of party pledges the extreme protectionists will have their way in every Republican Congress, and every Republican President will be forced to bow his neck to their yoke. Strong as are the President's inclinations toward a reasonable measure of tariff protection, strong as have been his expressions favoring a margin of protection that would only suffice to cover the difference in cost of production at home and abroad, he has been forced to surrender unconditionally to the radicals of the Aldrich-Cannon faction of his party. Any future Republican President who may favor moderation in tariff taxation will be subjected to the same humiliation.

The President's Winona speech was a slap in the face to the seven Republican Senators and the numerous Republican Representatives who voted against the Payne bill on its final passage. It was an affront to the Republican voters of Indiana, Iowa, Kansas, Minnesota, Wisconsin and other western states, under whose instructions these Senators and Representatives opposed the outrage to the last.

President Taft has forced the tariff issue between the two great parties to the line from which there is no receding. The "twilight zone" between the Democratic party and the Republican party on that question has disappeared. By his speech at Winona the official leader and spokesman of the Republican party notified the Republican tariff reformers of the Northwest and the middle West that the party has nothing for them.

The Democratic party is the only agency through which they can get what they want. The President has destroyed the usefulness of Republican tariff reform delegations in Congress. Ht has pointed Chairman Lloyd and the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee to the ground on which the great tariff battle of next year is to be fought.

John A. Johnson.

By the death of Governor John A. Johnson of Minnesota, in the prime of a strong manhood, the Democratic party loses a leader whose services were grand and for whom the possibilities of the future were large. At this critical time in the politics of the Northwestern states, when the Republican party there is menaced with a disruption that cannot be mended, his death is most unfortunate.

Born and reared in a state overwhelmingly Republican, John A. Johnson was a Democrat because he believed in Democratic principles. His political career from the time of his first election to the State Senate of Minnesota, in 1898, was a continuing proof that those principles honestly adhered to and boldly proclaimed are hardly less potent in Minnesota than in Missouri.

His Swedish parentage was not without influence in effecting his three successive elections to the governorship of his State, for the Scandinavian vote is large in Minnesota, but the strong personality of the man, his reforms in the interest of all the people, and, above all, his able advocacy of the Democratic principle of tariff for revenue were the foundations of his success.

President Taft might have hesitated to go into Minnesota to support the Payne tariff if he had given proper attention to the election returns, which show that Tariff Reformer Johnson was elected to the governorship of Minnesota in 1904 by the safe plurality of 8,000, while the plurality for Roosevelt was too big to count; by nearly 80,000 in 1906, when there was no presidential election, and by 20,000 in 1908 to Taft's 85,000.

Governor Johnson was a type of that numerous class of Americans who have risen to high station from hard and narrow surroundings in early life. He rose because he was born with the qualities which carry men upward.—St. Louis Republic.

Our Foreign Trade Balance.

This year's record of foreign trade of the United States will show a heavy decrease in the balance that so long has been in our favor. For twelve years previously this balance has grown steadily. During the last few months the tide has turned and imports have exceeded exports.

Falling off in exports is due largely to shortage and high prices of agricultural staples which we inherited from last year. Heavy imports, which have been a feature since January, apparently are a result of the greater industrial recovery in America as compared with Europe. Rush shipments to anticipate operation of the new tariff also have tended to swell the total.

In view of the high prices at which cereals and cotton are still held, immediate improvement in the export business is not to be expected. On the other hand, increasing prosperity will operate still further to stimulate imports.

What effect this condition will have on financial relations remains to be seen. This country has been so long accustomed to a trade balance in its favor that movement in the other direction is likely to be regarded with solicitude.

As the change is the result of natural conditions, there is little reason for apprehension. The only danger is in possibility of a drain on the gold supply, and this is largely obviated by increasing European investments in American securities.

A Good Stayer.

"Can you recommend me a young man of good staying power?"

"Oh, yes, sir. My daughter's young man."—Baltimore American.

HIS WORK INTERRUPTED.

—Indianapolis News.

FARM AND GARDEN

Fattening Hogs.

The hog is an omnivorous animal, and needs "roughage" and green feed for his best health and growth. A certain amount of grain feed is needed to grow hogs with the greatest profit, and still more is necessary to fatten and fit them for market. When young animals have an abundance of range with a good supply of nitrogenous foods, like alfalfa, clover, vetches and cow peas, corn makes a valuable addition to the ration, but should not be given in excess, and will usually be found more profitable if mixed with shorts, bran or other feed combining a large proportion of protein. For young pigs bran is not so good as shorts and ground cow peas may be used in the place of the latter when the price exceeds $20 per ton.

Feeding for the finish should not begin more than ten or twelve weeks before the hogs are to be sold. For the last six or eight weeks corn is undoubtedly the best grain, as the feed consumed during this time greatly influences the quality of the meat. Hogs take on flesh rapidly during the first weeks of heavy feeding, but longer feeding means slower gains. Quick work pays in fattening as well as in growing hogs, and when the animals are on good feed and fail to make a gain of at least one pound daily they should be sold or butchered.

Market your hogs at 6 or 8 months of age, at which time they should weigh 200 to 250 pounds. A greater per cent of profit is secured than if you keep them until 10 or 12 months old, because you avoid 60 to 120 days of daily animal waste. However, a hog which is made to weigh 300 pounds at 1 year is quite profitable.

Ingenious Hay Rack Lifter.

It very often happens that one wishes to remove the rack from the wagon when there is no one to assist. This may be very easily done with the device illustrated herewith. The four supporting poles are set in the ground at a sufficient distance apart to admit of driving between them with the rack. There are a number of hooks on the side of each, sufficient to make it possible to lift the rack a little at a time by means of the poles, as illustrated by the dotted lines. There is no need of a complicated block and tackle when such a simple device is so effective.—Frank Monroe in Farm and Home.

Destroying Quack Grass.

I often see directions given for killing out quack grass, but I think they are all inferior to the method that I employ. I would never try to drag out the roots with harrow or rake, because not all of the roots will be gathered and those left will soon fill the soil again. The pest can most easily be killed right where it is, the roots furnishing an abundance of plant food, by using a double action cut-away harrow. Now, please don't think that any kind of a harrow will do, because it will not. If you rely on any except the one I have mentioned you will be disappointed. I have used one to destroy quack grass many times, and am sure of what I am writing. If you plow before using the harrow, run the plow shallow—just deep enough to turn over the quack roots, bottom side up; let lay thus for a week and then go over the field with the double action cutaway harrow; then after a few days repeat the harrowing and keep at it, going over the field at intervals of a few days until the pest is all destroyed. It is no use to think that if the field be gone over, perhaps a dozen times in one day, the quack will be killed, for the sun, as well as the harrow, must get in its work. The way to do is to go over the field once, then wait a few days for the roots to dry and repeat the operation. By being thorough in this the grass can be destroyed and a crop grown the same year if commenced early in the spring.—F. H. Dow in Agricultural Epitomist.

Care of Milk Vessels.

The sooner the milk utensils and separator are washed after use the easier it is done and the less danger there is of their becoming foul. To do this properly you need three waters. First, use a lukewarm water to remove all the milk. Second, use water a little warmer, into which should be thrown a handful of salsoda or a few drops of concentrated lye. Third, use an abundance of boiling water, which must penetrate every nook and corner and remain long enough to destroy every germ that may still be looking for a home.

Protecting Birds.

With very few exceptions, birds are most valuable live stock on the farm. Even the so-called grain-eating birds earn their right to a home and protection by reason of the vast quantities of weed seeds they devour and the number of insects they destroy. Quails and meadow larks eat more insects than vegetable food and a very large percentage of the latter is composed of weed seeds. A single farmer cannot protect the birds on his place against all kinds of destructive vermin, including the town hunter, but he can combine with his neighbors, post every farm and secure his rights by helping to secure the rights of his brother farmers. Now is a good time to begin.—Kansas Farmer.

Grain Smuts.

A dangerous parasite of many of the cereal plants is the fungus that produces in the grain or head what is known as smut. There are several well known kinds of smut, each of which is caused by a distinct species of the fungus.

The greatest loss from smuts in this country is from the stinking smut of wheat and the loose smut of oats. A considerable loss is also due to the loose smuts of barley and wheat, which are more difficult to control and prevent. They are widely distributed, and though they occur usually in small quantities the damage in the aggregate is large. They often are entirely unnoticed on account of their earliness and the absence of any conspicuous sign of them at harvest time.

The stinking smut of wheat transforms only the kernels into smut balls which do not break until the wheat is threshed and often remain intact in the threshed grain. The loose smuts of barley, on the other hand, early discharge their spores, which are blown off by the wind as soon as the smutted head comes out of the leaf sheath; they infect the plant in the flowering stage and enter the embryo inside the ovary before the latter ripens into seed. An infected seed developes a smutted plant the following year.

The most successful method thus far found for preventing these smuts is a hot-water treatment of the seed. This treatment is described in Bureau of Plant Industry bulletin 152, entitled "The Loose Smuts of Barley and Wheat," recently issued by the United States Department of Agriculture. The bulletin is a report of recent researches into the life histories of these smuts and the determination of methods for their prevention.

Danger of Barbed Wire.

Barbed wire is all right, for stock cattle and makes a cheap fence, but it is hard to construct such a fence to turn hogs, and, owing to its dangerous characteristics, it is out of the question for horses, and even for milch cows.

With the woven wire fence the post expense is not so great as that of the other kinds, as they need not be so heavy, and may be set a good distance apart. Heavy end posts are an absolute necessity, and they should be set in the ground not less than 3½ to 4 feet deep. If the line posts are 20 to 25 feet apart it is a very good idea to have every fourth post of good size, longer than the others, to allow extra setting. In setting end posts dig a big hole, put the post in, and begin to tamp and ram from the very bottom not filling it too fast, so as to get the earth about the post packed from the bottom to the top. The "dead man" plan of bracing a post is perhaps better than any other. The "dead man" is a short post or heavy stone buried about 3 feet deep, 4 feet from the end posts, and with a cable made of plain galvanized wire to the post top and around the dead man the post can be held for years as firmly as when set. Be sure to use galvanized wire, as black wire will not last more than six or seven years.

A 20-inch high woven wire fence, two smooth No. 10 and one barbed wire at the very top, makes a good fence for any kind of stock, and can be put up for less than 40 cents per rod, exclusive of posts.—Lexington Herald.

Best Type of Milch Cows.

A cow with her second or third calf is the most desirable of all, and this is undoubtedly the most profitable age to buy them. As milkers and breeders, they have all their best days in front of them, and with sufficient time to pay handsomely. Young and old cows are very distinct in appearance. The former have an unmistakable appearance of fullness of flesh and coat, while the old ones are more or less shrunk. The teeth give an indication of age, and the horns are often looked to as a guide, the young having smooth horns, while those of the aged are wrinkled. If cross-breeds are bought, get them with the greatest tendency toward the best breed the cross has been secured from. Cows with a male or bull type of head are rarely good milkers. The head should be refined, neck thin, forequarters wide, square and robust, with deep, broad thighs.

Alfalfa for Pasture.

Alfalfa has not been used to any great extent in the Eastern States for pasture. For cattle it is known as a dangerous pasture, on account of its tendency to produce bloat, and cannot be safely used unless the animals are kept on it continually. For sheep and swine it furnishes the best of pasture. There is, however, one drawback to the use of alfalfa for grazing purposes, on account of its liability to be tramped out by the stock pasturing on it. It may be that after alfalfa comes to be more commonly grown that it will be found valuable for pasturing purposes, but as yet it is grown principally for hay.—Farm and Fireside.

Fruit Tree Borers.

The Ohio Experiment Station recommends as a treatment for killing peach and plum tree borers, 3 pounds of naphtha soap emulsified by boiling in three gallons of water; while hot add one gallon of carbolineum avenarius, which can be obtained through dealers in market gardeners' and fruit growers' supplies. This can best be mixed by the use of a force pump. When the soap solution and carbolineum are thoroughly mixed add four gallons of water and apply with a spray pump, being careful to protect hands and face when using.

They'll Want the Wood.

The forest famine is not to be immediate, said Mr. Pinchot at Denver. "We have forests in plenty for the present generation, and perhaps for the next, but in the years to come there will be famine a-plenty if we don't at this time take the stitch in time."

THE HOUSEHOLD

New Stirring Spoon.

Among the numerous devices for beating eggs, cream or any material used in batter the utensil designed by a Pennsylvania man and shown in the cut is one of the most effective. This is a spoon which beats up the batter by a sort of double-back action motion. In the bowl of the spoon, which is a long-handled one, is set a little device that looks for all the world like the screw propeller of a boat. It is a four-armed wheel with the arm bent in different directions on each side and is so arranged that it revolves rapidly within the bowl of the spoon when the spoon is agitated, and in an opposite direction. Before any of the modern beating utensils were invented housewives used spoons for the purpose, and with complete success, if the tales about the bread and cake that mother used to make are to be believed. However that may be, such a spoon as that just described will both lighten the work and insure a thorough mixing.

Eggs in Cream.

Use very thick cream, a dessert spoonful to each egg to cook them in. Put the cream in a large deep granite-ware pie dish and set on top of the stove for a minute or two, until the cream gets thin. Then break in the eggs; sprinkle a little salt and white pepper over each egg, set the dish back on the stove, cover close and let stand two or three minutes, or until the eggs are nicely set. These are most delicious served with toast and coffee for breakfast.

Bread Crumb Griddlecakes.

Soak two cups of bread crumbs in cold water; turn into a cloth and wring out the water; add two cups of thick sour milk and one cup of flour. Let stand over night, then add one egg beaten very light, half a teaspoonful of salt, one teaspoonful of soda dissolved in one or two tablespoonfuls of cold water, and two tablespoonfuls of flour sifted with two teaspoonfuls of baking powder. Mix thoroughly. A little more flour may be needed.

Green Tomato Pickles.

Cut into slices four quarts of green tomatoes, but do not peel them. Add to them six large onions that have been peeled and sliced. Put into the preserving kettle and stir in a cupful of brown sugar, a tablespoonful each of mustard seed, pepper and cloves and allspice and a quart of vinegar. Stew all together until the tomatoes are tender, then pack into jars and seal.

Tea Baskets.

Make a short sweetened pie crust, roll thin and partly bake in sheets. Before it is quite done take from the oven, cut in squares of 4 inches or so, take up two diagonal corners and pinch together, which makes them basket shaped. Now fill with whipped cream well sweetened and flavored and return to the oven for a few minutes.

Prune Tartlets.

Line six small patty pans with good pastry, fill with halved, pitted, stewed prunes. When baked cover with a meringue made of the whites of two small eggs beaten stiff and three tablespoonfuls of fine granulated sugar beaten in, also a few drops of vanilla. Return to oven and let meringue brown lightly. Whipped cream may be used instead of the meringue.

Vinegar Pie.

A quick and easy way to make a good pie is to make and bake one crust and fill with the following: Two-thirds cup of sugar, two tablespoons flour, and two of vinegar, beaten yolk of an egg, and one pint of boiling water. Cook until mixture thickens and flavor with lemon. This hardly can be told from a lemon pie.

Baked Bean Sandwiches.

Mash a cupful of baked beans, add a teaspoonful of chopped parsley, a teaspoonful of onion juice and a little prepared mustard. Season to taste with salt and white pepper. Butter white bread on the loaf, cut into thin slices and spread with the filling. Trim off the crusts and cut into shapes.

Breakfast Muffins.

One egg, well beaten, one tablespoon melted butter, one-half cup of milk, one-half teaspoon salt, one and one-half cups flour, with one teaspoon baking powder sifted in; beat well for a few minutes. Have muffin tins hot. Bake 20 minutes in a hot oven. Serve hot.

Southern Potatoes.

Four or five potatoes boiled soft, mash with one-half cup of milk until creamed, one egg beaten well, one tablespoonful of butter, salt and pepper, a small onion chopped up fine; put this on a pan and form in a cone shape; pour one well beaten egg on the top; put in the oven to brown.

No-Egg Raisin Cake.

One cup sugar, one-half cup butter creamed together, two mixing spoons of molasses, quarter teaspoonful cinnamon, one cup sour milk, two and one-half level cups of flour (measured after sifting once), one cup of raisins cut in halves and rolled in flour. Keep moist as long as it lasts.

Chicken Broth and Rice.

Stew the fowl gently until tender and remove it from the broth. Throw into the soup one tablespoonful of rice, season with salt and pepper and a little of fresh parsley chopped fine.

Powdered arrowroot is preferable to cornstarch for thickening fruit juices, for it keeps the juice transparent and prevents lumping.

The Redemption of David Corson

By CHARLES FREDERIC GOSS

CHAPTER IV.—(Continued.)

Having stalked indignantly onward for a few paces, the doctor discovered that his wife had not followed him, and turning he called savagely: "Pepeeta, come! It is folly to try and p-p-persuade him. Let us leave the saint to his prayers! But let him remember the old p-p-proverb, 'young saint, old sinner!' Come!"

He proceeded towards the carriage; but Pepeeta seemed rooted to the ground, and David was equally incapable of motion. While they stood thus, gazing into each other's eyes, they saw nothing and they saw all. That brief glance was freighted with destiny. A subtle communication had taken place between them, although they had not spoken; for the eye has a language of its own.

What was the meaning of that glance? What was the emotion that gave it birth in the soul? He knew! It told its own story. To their dying day, the actors in that silent drama remembered that glance with rapture and with pain.

Pepeeta spoke first, hurriedly and anxiously: "What did you say last night about the 'light of life?' Tell me! I must know."

"I said there is a light that lighteth every man that cometh into the world."

"And what did you mean? Be quick. There is only a moment!"

"I meant that there is a light that shines from the soul itself and that in this light we may walk, and he who walks in it, walks safely. He need never fall!"

"Never? I do not understand; it is beautiful; but I do not understand!"

"Pepeeta!" called her husband, angrily.

She turned away, and David watched her gliding out of his sight, with an irrepressible pain and longing. "I suppose she is his daughter," he said to himself, and upon that natural but mistaken inference his whole destiny turned. Something seemed to draw him after her. He took a step or two, halted, sighed and returned to his labor.

But it was to a strangely altered world that he went. Its glory had vanished; it was desolate and empty, or so at least it seemed to him, for he confounded the outer and the inner worlds, as it was his nature and habit to do. It was in his soul that the change had taken place.

Thoughts which he had always been able to expel from his mind before, like evil birds fluttered again and again into the windows of his soul. For this he upbraided himself; but only to discover that at the very moment when he regretted that he had been tempted at all, he also regretted that he had not been tempted further.

All day long his agitated spirit alternated between remorse that he had enjoyed so much, and regret that he had enjoyed so little. Never had he experienced such a tumult in his soul. He struggled hard, but he could not tell whether he had conquered or been defeated.

He heard again the mocking laughter of the quack, and the stinging words of his cynical philosophy once more rang in his ears. What this coarse wretch had said was true, then! Much of his youth had already passed and he had not as yet tasted the only substantial joys of existence—money, pleasure, ambition, love!! He felt that he had been deceived and defrauded.

A contempt for his old life and its surroundings crept upon him. He began to despise the simple country people among whom he had grown up, and those provincial ideas which they cherished in the little, unknown nook of the world where they stagnated.

During a long time he permitted himself to be borne upon the current of these thoughts without trying to stem it, till it seemed as if he would be swept completely from his moorings. But his trust had been firmly anchored, and did not easily let go its hold. The convictions of a lifetime began to reassert themselves. They rose and struggled heroically for the possession of his spirit.

Had the battle been with the simple abstraction of philosophic doubt, the good might have prevailed, but there obtruded itself into the field the concrete form of the gypsy. The glance of her lustrous eye, the gleam of her milk-white teeth, the heaving of her agitated bosom, the inscrutable but suggestive expression of her flushed and eager face, these were foes against which he struggled in vain. A feverish desire, whose true significance he did not altogether understand, tugged at his heart, and he felt himself drawn by unseen hands toward this mysterious and beautiful being. She seemed to him at that awful moment, when his whole world of thought and feeling was slipping from under his feet, the one only abiding reality. She at least was not an impalpable vision, but solid, substantial, palpitating flesh and blood. Like continuously advancing waves which sooner or later must undermine a dyke, the passions and suspicions of his newly awakened nature were sapping the foundations of his belief.

At intervals he gained a little courage to withstand them, and at such moments tried to pray; but the effort was futile, for neither would the accustomed syllables of petition spring to his lips, nor the feelings of faith and devotion arise within his heart.

CHAPTER V.

Violent emotions, like the lunar tides, must have their ebb because they have their flow. The feelings do not so much advance like a river, as oscillate like a pendulum. Striding homeward, David's determination to join his fortunes to those of the two adventurers began to wane. He trembled at an unknown future and hesitated before untried paths.

Already the strange experience through which he had passed began to seem to him like a half-forgotten dream. The refluent thoughts and feelings of his religious life began to set back into every bay and estuary of his soul.

With a sense of shame, he regretted his hasty decision, and was saying to himself, "I will arise and go to my Father," for all the experiences of life clothed themselves at once in the familiar language of the Scriptures.

It is more than likely that he would have carried out this resolution, and that this whole experience would have become a mere incident in his life history, if his destiny had depended upon his personal volition. But how few of the great events of life are brought about by our choice alone!

Just at sunset he crossed the bridge over the brook which formed the boundary line of the farm, and as he did so heard a light footstep. Lifting his eyes, he saw Pepeeta, who at that very instant stepped out of the low bushes which lined the trail she had been following.

Her appearance was as sudden as an apparition and her beauty dazzled him. Her face, flushed with exercise, gleamed against the background of her black hair with a sort of spiritual radiance. When she saw the Quaker, a smile of unmistakable delight flashed upon her features and added to her bewitching grace. She might have been an Oread or a Dryad wandering alone through the great forest. What bliss for youth and beauty to meet thus at the close of day amid the solitudes of Nature!

Had Nature forgotten herself, to permit these two young and impressionable beings to enjoy this pleasure on a lonely road just as the day was dying and the tense energies of the world were relaxed? There are times when her indifference to her own most inviolable laws seems anarchic. There are moments when she appears wantonly to lure her children to destruction.

They gazed into each other's eyes, they knew not how long, with an incomprehensible and delicious joy, and then looked down upon the ground. Having regained their composure by this act, they lifted their eyes and regarded each other with frank and friendly smiles.

"I thought thee had gone," said David.

"We stayed longer than we expected," Pepeeta replied.

"Has thee been hunting wild flowers?" he asked, observing the bouquet which she held in her hand.

"I picked them on the way."

"Thee does love the woods?"

"Oh, so much! I am a sort of wild creature and should like to live in a cave."

"I am afraid thee would always turn thy face homeward at dusk, as thee is doing now," he said with a smile.

"Oh, no! I am not afraid! I go because I must."

The path was wide enough for two, and side by side they moved slowly forward.

The somber garb in which he was dressed, and the brilliant colors of her apparel, afforded a contrast like that between a pheasant and a scarlet tanager. Color, form, motion—all were perfect. They fitted into the scene without a jar or discord, and enhanced rather than disturbed the harmony of the drowsy landscape.

As they walked onward, they vaguely felt the influence of the repose that was stealing upon the tired world; the intellectual and volitional elements of their natures becoming gradually quiescent, the emotions were given full sway. They felt themselves drawn toward each other by some irresistible power, and, although they had never before been conscious of any incompleteness of their lives, they suddenly discovered affinities of whose existence they had never dreamed. Their two personalities seemed to be absorbed into one new mysterious and indivisible being, and this identity gave them an incomprehensible joy. Over them as they walked, Nature brooded, sphynx-like. Their young and healthy natures were tuned in unison with the harmonies of the world like perfect instruments from which the delicate fingers of the great Musician evoked a melody of which she never tired, reserving her discords for a future day. On this delicious evening she permitted them to be thrilled through and through with joy and hope and she accompanied the song their hearts were singing with her own multitudinous voices. "Be happy," chirped the birds; "be happy," whispered the evening breeze; "be happy," murmured the brook, running along by their side and looking up into their faces with laughter. The whole world seemed to resound with the refrain, "Be happy! Be happy! for you are young, are young!" Pepeeta first broke the silence.

"I had never heard of the things about which you talked," she said.

"Thee never had? How could that be? I thought that every one knew them!"

"I must have lived in a different world from yours."

"And thee was happy?"

"I thought so until I heard what you said. Since then I have been full of care and trouble. I wish I knew what you meant! But I have seen that wonderful light!"

"Thee has seen it?"

"Yes, to-day! And I followed it; I shall always follow it."

"When does thee leave the village?" David asked, fearing the conversation would lead where he did not want to go.

"To-morrow," she said.

"Does thee think that the doctor would renew his offer to take me with him?"

"Do I think so? Oh! I am sure."

"Then I will go."

"You will go? Oh, I am so happy! The doctor was very angry; he has not been himself since. You don't know how glad he will be."

"But will not thee be happy, too?" he asked.

"Happier than you could dream," she answered with all the frankness of a child.

Having reached the edge of the woods, where their paths separated, they paused.

"We must part," said David.

"Yes; but we shall meet to-morrow."

"Good-bye."

"Good-bye."

At the touch of their hands their young hearts were swayed by tender and tumultuous feelings. A too strong pressure startled them, and they loosened their grasp. The sun sank behind the hill. The shadows that fell upon their faces awakened them from their dreams. Again they said good-bye and reluctantly parted. Once they stopped and, turning, waved their hands; and the next moment Pepeeta entered the road which led her out of sight.

In this interview, the entire past of these two lives seemed to count for nothing. If Pepeeta had never seen anything of the world; if she had issued from a nunnery at that very moment, she could not have acted with a more utter disregard of every principle of safety.

It was the same with David. The fact that he had been reared a Quaker; that he had been dedicated to God from his youth; that he had struggled all his days to be prepared for such a moment as this, did not affect him to the least degree.

The seasoning of the bow does not invariably prevent it from snapping. The drill on the parade ground does not always insure courage for the battle. Nothing is more terrible than this futility of the past.

Such scenes as this discredit the value of experience, and attach a terrible reality to the conclusion of Coleridge, that "it is like the stern-light of a vessel—illuminating only the path over which we have traveled."

It was to this moment that their consciences traced their sorrows; it was to that act of their souls which permitted them to enjoy that momentary rapture that they attached their guilt; it was at that moment and in that silent place that they planted the seeds of the trees upon which they were subsequently crucified.

HUNTING IN CHINA.

Variety of Game Found Among the Royal Tombs.

Four hours by train southwest of Peking lie the Hsi Ling or Western Tombs, the mausolea of the reigning dynasty. The tombs lie in a large parklike inclosure containing some sixty square miles of broken, hilly country in which the Chinese are not allowed to settle and which may not be plowed up. In consequence of this it's a refuge for all kinds of game and about the only sure find for pheasants within easy reach of Peking.

A kind of chamois (the Indian goral) and spotted deer are found on the higher hills and are preyed on by the panther and the wolf. As soon as the frost sets in for the winter the Chinese begin shooting the pheasants, and although they seem to do their best to exterminate them, a good many apparently escape and provide the stock for the following year.

The birds are shot over dogs, some of which have really good noses, though in appearance they differ in no way from the scavengers of the village streets. If possible a tame hawk is also taken out to mark down birds that are missed or not fired at. The man with the hawk takes his stand on a commanding hill and the hunter with his dog proceeds to draw round him. If the dog puts up a pheasant which is missed by the Chinaman, or a brace, only one of which can be fired at, the hawk is at once loosed and pheasant and hawk disappear together. The hunter reloads and follows and finds the hawk by means of a small bell attached to its back probably sitting on a rock or tree stump.

He then sends his dog in to put up the pheasant, which is invariably hiding in a thick bit of cover within a few yards of the hawk. As long as the hawk is sitting there the poor bird will neither run nor fly, and thus falls an easy victim to the hunter. In this way a couple of Chinamen with a gun, a dog, and a hawk make comparatively large bags in places where the foreigner vainly attempting to walk up his game with a straggling line of useless Chinese beaters will probably only get a few shots in a day, and certainly never find a pheasant again which he has once missed.

On the stonier hills, where there is less cover, chikor are found in considerable quantities and give very fair sport, except for their indefatigable powers of running uphill; but the Chinese keep them still by using a hawk. Along the streams, fighting hard to keep open in spite of the severe frost, a few duck and snipe may be picked up, the latter heavier and plumper birds than regular spring and autumn visitors.

Give the Children Sugar.

Children may eat too much sugar and they may also stay too long in their bath tub, or in the creek when they go in swimming, or get tanned or a headache from playing too long in the sun, or chilled by staying too long in the open air; but is that any sound reason why they should be deprived of sweets, sunlight, baths and fresh air, or discouraged from indulging in them? All that is needed, says Dr. Woods Hutchinson in Success Magazine, is a little common sense regulation and judicious supervision, not prohibition, or denunciation. Most of the extraordinary craving for pure sugar and candy, which is supposed to lead the average child to inevitably "founder himself" is left to his own sweet will and a box of candy, is due to a state of artificial and abnormal sugar starvation, produced by an insufficient amount of this invaluable food in its regular diet. Children who are given plenty of sugar on their mush, bread and butter, and puddings, a regular allowance of cake and plenty of sweet fruits, are almost free from this craze for candy, this tendency to gorge themselves to surfeit, and can usually be trusted with both the candy box and the sugar bowl.

Great Crops in Western Canada

Canadian Correspondence:

During the early days in the growth of the crop in Western Canada, as well as throughout the ripening and garnering period, there is yearly growing an increasing interest throughout the United States, as to the probable results when harvest is completed. These mean much to the thousands of Americans who have made their home in some one of the three Provinces that form that vast agricultural domain, and is of considerable interest to the friends they have left behind them.

The year 1909 is no disappointment; it will bring comfort and happiness, wealth and luxury to those who are following agriculture as a pursuit in the country now occupying so much of the attention of the world—of this continent in particular. Reports from the grain fields warrant the note of optimism that has been so prominent during the past few months. The crops of wheat, oats and barley have been harvested and it is now safe to speak of results. Throughout the entire grain-growing area of 220,000 square miles there has been a uniform production and a high average. Careful estimates place the yield of spring wheat at 20 bushels per acre, winter wheat at over 40 bushels and oats exceed 50 bushels per acre. Barley also has proved an abundant yield. What will attract the reading public more than volumes of figures will be the fact that those who have been induced through the influence of the Government to accept of 160 acres of free grant land, or, by the persuasion of friends to leave their home State of Dakota, Minnesota, Iowa, Illinois, Michigan, Indiana, Ohio, Nebraska or the other States from which people have gone, have done well. Financially, they are in a better position than many of them ever expected to be, and in the matter of health, in social conditions, they have lost nothing.

The columns of Canadian newspapers are filled with accounts of this year's harvest, writers vying with each other in giving the proper coloring to their reports. These make exhilarating reading to the man who has interests in that country. Lethbridge people claim it to be the keystone of Southern Alberta, while Calgary people claim the same for their district. It was in this district that the growing of winter wheat in western Canada originated. Its success there led the farmers east and west of it to experiment and what can now be said of one part may well be said of the whole. In a few years from now these great plains over whose breadth for years roved hundreds of thousands of heads of cattle, following the millions of buffalo that once grazed their grasses, will be a solid grain field covering a territory of over 30,000 square miles, and very little of it but what will yet be worth from $40 to $60 per acre. Already the homestead and pre-emption lands are being well filled.

In the district of Calgary and in Central Alberta, since the report of a year ago was made, the increased acreage in crop has been remarkable. The newly-arrived settler has got to work and with the steam-plow and ordinary methods of farming a large amount of new land is contributing to the wealth of the country. Railroads have projected and built branches which reach out laterally from the main line, and it is now possible to reach parts rich in agricultural possibilities that were not accessible a year ago. Towns have come into existence during that time that will soon become cities; schools and churches have been erected throughout the country districts; telephone lines have been constructed, and an air of prosperity is everywhere apparent. There are to be found those who speak of a "pioneering" life in western Canada, but as one man said, "if this is pioneering I don't for the life of me see what our forefathers had to complain of." He didn't know, though, for the pioneering of his forefathers was discomfort and hardship. The opening up and development of western Canada, with its railroad lines to carry one to almost the uttermost part of it, the telegraph line to flash the news to the other outside world, the telephone to talk to one's neighbor, the daily and weekly mail service which brings and carries letters to the friends in distant parts; the schools headed by college-bred and highly - certificated teachers; the churches manned by brilliant divines; the clubs; the social and festive life; what is there about any of this to give to the man who goes there to make his home the credit of being a pioneer? Nothing! He might as well be in any of the old middle west states.

A few years ago when this country was not as well known as to-day there was some justification in long-winded attempts to educate the reader on conditions there, to tell him of its geographical relation with the United States, but with about 400,000 Americans now there writing back to their friends, with the mass of literature that has been placed in the homes of farmers in every State of the Union and the thousands of columns descriptive of the country that have appeared in newspapers and magazines, it would seem a reflection on the intelligence of the reading public to repeat it. It is not proposed to do so. Its topographical characteristics are divergent. There is the level prairie with its rich deep loam and underlying subsoil, the higher and rolling lands with their groves of timber, the wooded lands rich in soil. The wants of all can be supplied; some want one kind and some another and they can all be suited. The man who wants to put in his steam plow and force the energies of the soil into immediate production can be suited, and so can the man who wishes large tracts for the same purposes, and at the same time enjoy the companionship of the timber. In many parts it is possible to have a hundred mile square of wheat, without a break. A writer says: "We were driven west and north of Moose Jaw through 20 miles of dead ripe wheat, acres of stooks and well-worked summer-fallows. One of these fields would yield 40 bushels to the acre, and another man had oats that would yield 90 or 100 bushels to the acre. In this district wheat will average 30 to 35 bushels. The conditions were never better and throughout the district the people are assured of a most prosperous year." In the Melfort district, three hundred miles in another direction, we hear of a farmer whose yield of oats will run from 85 to 100 bushels per acre; then traveling over another stretch of three hundred miles the Pipestone district in Manitoba is reached and we learn of more 30 and 40 bushels to the acre crops of wheat. So it will be seen that the splendid crops are not confined to one district, but are general throughout the entire country.

Speaking of his experiences while traveling through the Canadian West, Thomas C. Shotwell, financial Editor of the New York American, said that heretofore he had entertained optimistic views regarding the Canadian railroads and lands, but his trip has convinced him, not only of the soundness of his views, but it also has established the conviction that the great expansion of the next few years will be in Canada's western areas. "I have never seen such wheat," said he.

It takes an army of men to handle the Western Canada crop, and it is estimated that 30,000 people have been brought in this year to assist in the great undertaking; there being excursions from the outside world nearly every day for the past six weeks.

In this article no attention has been given to the growth of flax which has had great attention paid to it in some districts. It is safe to say that in addition to the 120 million bushels of wheat, the 170 million bushels of oats and the 30 million bushels of barley, there will be over two million bushels of flax. The approximate value of all these crops may safely be put at One Hundred and Sixty Million Dollars, as against a total of 118 million dollars in 1908.

WAR NEWS, 1861-64.

How Newspapers Treated Startling Events—Three Columns Told of Fall of Sumter.

THE OLD WAY AND THE NEW

Facts of Momentous History-Making Events Were Made Secondary to Editorial Comment.

The war with Spain taxed the journalistic resources of America, vast as they are. There was no possible combination of brain, money, and muscle that was not brought into play. Hundreds of workers in all branches of the profession were sent to the front.

In the matter of news gathering things have changed mightily since the days of over forty years ago. There were daily papers—plenty of them—when the cable of the Union snapped under the long strain, and the two sections of the country drifted apart. They had what they called the "magnetic telegraph," too, but they were a little chary about using it. It cost money, and the leased wire had not been invented. No correspondent sat on a stump with a typewriter on his knees and clicked off beautiful stuff, while the bullets made sounds like splitting silk in the air around him, as Richard Harding Davis did in Greece and in Cuba. News in those days came by mail, and it was sent by correspondents who had much reverence for the general commanding and took what he said as matter inspired. They were not more anxious to be killed than are the correspondents of this day, and kept out of harm's way as much as possible. It stands to reason that when a man is fifteen miles back of the zone of fire all day, and is then forced to get his information from a flabbergasted general who is thinking only how best to preserve his own reputation and save his head, the "news" he sends on to his paper is likely to be a little off color.

Any reader of the modern newspaper who desires to have the strong contrast between the paper of the '60s and the paper of the present time brought to his mind, has only to examine a war file of some of the journals that are still nationally known. Take the New York Tribune, for instance, which at the outbreak of hostilities was one of the most prosperous and influential dailies in this country. It had a high-class editorial screamer as its Washington correspondent, and Horace Greeley as its editor. One would think that there was a combination to make envious rivals shiver and turn pale. It did not. The rivals were no better and no worse than it. It used to subdivide its local intelligence into departments, headed respectively "Local Items" and "Brooklyn Items." This was all the heading they got. It has been many years since the word "item" has been used in a newspaper to describe a news story. The Tribune published a detailed report of the proceedings of Congress, much the same as is now given to its million of readers by that accurate and sportive journal, the Congressional Record. The important news of each issue was not printed upon the first page, but upon the fifth page, opposite to the editorial page. Those were the days of "personal editors," when one man dominated the paper and the paper's constituency. It got brief telegrams from Washington each day, which it printed, bearing the credit line "By Magnetic Telegraph."

The national capital was then boiling and bubbling like a caldron. All men saw that the inevitable conflict could not be much longer postponed, and those who met their neighbors in the morning after a restless night looked at them with scared eyes and asked for intelligence that was dreaded. The Tribune had ample warning of the impending crash, and the preparations made to report the first overt act of war were on a scale commensurate with its standing and influence. It hired a man in Charleston to send it something in case the "rebels" succeeding in scaring up nerve enough to do anything. It may be said that it was two years after this before the word "Confederates" found its way into the columns of the Tribune.

Sumter was attacked and the Tribune man did himself and his paper proud. He sent a total of three columns, which were printed, of course, on the fifth page, under a "scare head," a single column in width and containing twenty-two black lines. On April 12, while the guns from the island batteries and the guns from the fort were roaring all day, he sent on seven dispatches of an average length of 100 words, giving the progress of the engagement. He announced the occurrence of the most momentous event in national history in these words: "The ball has opened." He ended one of his dispatches with the statement, "These are lively times here," and another with the similar statement, "These are reviving times on the Palmetto coast." Evidently he desired to give the paper its money's worth, and he could not think of anything else to say. He paid, however, even at that early day, a compliment to the splendid gallantry of the American fighter, whether he comes from the North or the South: "The soldiers are perfectly reckless of their lives," he said, "and at every shot jump upon the ramparts and then jump down, cheering." The Tribune went to its readers with the proud consciousness that it had done everything possible to a great journal in covering the Sumter affair, and doubtless its readers thought so, too.

On the morning of July 22, 1861, it plastered itself with glory an inch thick, and one can imagine without difficulty the smile that spread itself over the benign features of "Uncle Horace" when he picked up the paper from his desk and saw that it had not been beaten upon the battle of Bull Run. To this wrestle of the gods and Titans nearly a page is devoted—the fifth page. The headlines are still one column wide, and, in the light of these latter days, read queerly. Here are some of them: "Great Battle Fought," "The Batteries of Bull's Run Captured," "Splendid Union Victory," "A Death Blow to Secession" "Heroism of the Union Forces," "They Know No Such Word as Fail," "Not Over 500 Killed and Wounded," "Forty Wagonloads of Dead Rebels." Two days later the Tribune announced "The Battle Decisively Won." It did have something to say, however, of a "panic among the teamsters." It will be seen that the Bull Run man, like the Charleston man, rose to the occasion and demonstrated what a journalist can do when put to it.

The files of the New York dailies for the four years of the civil war are an object lesson in the evolution of the American newspaper. In that time they gradually grew out of their inefficiency, and grew used to war. Its correspondents learned that they would not be shot every time they got close enough to battle to hear the bullets sing overhead. They learned to establish lines of communication from the front to the rear and from the rear to the nearest telegraph office, independent of the government lines. They learned to judge of the progress of the fray by what they saw of the wounded streaming to the rear, of the ordering forward of reserves, of the steady backward or forward movement of the lines, of the thousand things of a battlefield that tell the story of victory or defeat as plainly as words. They became too wise for the general commanding. His steoreotyped reply, "We are winning all along the line," lost its force. They stopped asking him any questions at all. He used to send for them and ask them questions, which they answered correctly or not, as they saw fit. The journalist was developing into the newspaper man and the newspaper man was beginning to assert himself, to feel and to know that he was by far the most dangerous animal on the field, despite the men with the guns.

The consequence of this evolution was that when Gettysburg was fought, nearly two years afterward, the headlines of the Tribune on the morning after the third day of the gigantic struggle told the story of the result fairly well. The news had been moved to the first page by that time. Editorial paragraphs had become a secondary or tertiary feature of that and other papers. The "personal editor" at last had been brought into contact with men and events bigger than he. He might rise in his wrath and denounce some contemporary as a "horse thief and liar," and excite only a fleeting smile of amusement. Probably the contemporary was so busy reading and editing the news from the front that he did not see the denunciation. The headlines of the Tribune on the fourth day, when the guns of Gettysburg were hushed forever, said, "The Severest Action of the War." "Losses on Both Sides Heavy." "Advantage on Our Side. That was the truth, even as we see it to-day. Still a scant four columns were devoted to the intelligence. The paper of this time which printed less than five pages about so enormous a conflict would consider itself irretrievably disgraced.—Chicago Inter Ocean.

Dwindling Grand Army.

This year the encampment of the Grand Army of the Republic was in Utah, on soil that was scarcely considered at the time of the great rebellion. The attendance was necessarily less than would be the case in a more accessible city, but the patent and pathetic fact is that each year the membership grows rapidly less. A few years more and the last survivor will totter in the parade.

At the close of the civil war there were more than a million men in the union army in the field, not counting one-third as many sick or absent for various causes. It is believed that there were actually about 2,200,000 separate men who enlisted during the four years and the deaths from all causes were more than 350,000, not including a large number of missing who were never accounted for. In 1865 the average age of the discharged soldier was almost 25 years, which would make the average of those surviving nearly 70. It is believed that about 550,000 of these still survive, but they are passing away at the rate of almost 40,000 a year, the Philadelphia Inquirer says. In ten years more it is likely that only a handful will remain. The Grand Army has about 225,000 members, but it is being depleted rapidly by death, so it is certain that in a few years there will be no more strong rivalry for the honor of having the encampment. In some quarters surprise has been manifested that so large a number of veterans still survive. It should not be forgotten that of those who enlisted there were many who saw comparatively little service and that of no dangerous sort. Most of the total enlistment was of young men—boys we should call them now—over a third being no more than 18. Then disease and exertion quickly weeded out those of poor physique, and those who survived battle and camp disease were of the fittest. They had shown their right to live. It is remembered that veterans of Napoleon's armies lived to extraordinary ages and the last died only a few years ago; indeed, there are some very old men living who claim to have served under the "Little Corporal."

The nation pays its respects to this aged body of veterans and honors them for what they did, for their patriotic impulses as well as their achievements. They not only saved the nation, but in times of peace they have sowed the seeds of patriotism in soil which will produce a hundredfold. The veterans are grizzled, grim and gray. They falter as they march and every week sees a whole regiment disappear. But the lesson the brave men in blue have taught will last longer than the monuments of bronze now erected to perpetuate the memory of their valor. Hats off to the "boys in blue!"

Shot and Killed Wife

(Stryker Advance)

This village was terribly shocked Wednesday afternoon when the report reached town that Henry Flory, living on the Dupree place, one mile west of Stryker, had accidentally shot and killed his wife. The following particulars we got from one who attended the inquest.

Mr. Flory had been using his double barrel shot gun to kill some pigeons for one of his children and went into the house to reload the gun. He then sat down inside the kitchen door with the gun across his knees, both barrels cocked. In some manner one of the barrels was discharged blowing a hole through the screen door. The gun flew up with the explosion, when the other barrel was discharged, the load striking Mrs. Flory full in the chest just under the chin, tearing a hole about three inches in diameter.

The deceased is the daughter of John Peter Grim, near Burlington. She leaves a family of seven children, the smallest a baby four months old.

PEARY'S EVIDENCE AGAINST DR. COOK

Alleges Cook Did Not Reach North Pole.

PROOF OF STATEMENT.

Witnesses Quoted Are Cook's Eskimo Boys.

NATIVES LAUGH AT CLAIM.

Point Out Limit of Explorer's Journey on Carefully Prepared Map.

New York, October 12.—The following statement of Commander Robert E. Peary, which he submitted, together with the accompanying map, to the Peary Arctic Club in support of his contention that Dr. Cook did not reach the North Pole, is now made public for the first time. The statement and map have been copyrighted by the Peary Arctic Club.

(Entered according to Act of congress, in the year 1909, by the Peary Arctic Club, in the office of the Librarian of Congress, at Washington, D. C.)

INTRODUCTION BY PEARY.

Some of my reasons for saying that Dr. Cook did not go to the North Pole will be understood by those who read the following statements of the two Eskimo boys who went with him, and who told me and others of my party where he did go. Several Eskimos who started with Dr. Cook from Anoratok in February, 1908, were at Etah when I arrived there in August, 1908. They told me that Dr. Cook had with him, after they left, two Eskimo boys or young men, two sledges and some twenty dogs. The boys were I-took-a-shoo and Ah-pe-lah. I had known them from their childhood. One was about eighteen and the other about nineteen years of age.

On my return from Cape Sheridan and at the very first settlement I touched (Nerke, near Cape Chalon) in August, 1909, and nine days before reaching Etah, the Eskimos told me, in a general way, where Dr. Cook had been; that he had wintered in Jones Sound and that he had told the white men at Etah that he had been a long way north, but that the boys who were with him, I-took-a-shoo and Ah-pe-lah, said that this was not so. The Eskimos laughed at Dr. Cook's story. On reaching Etah, I talked with the Eskimos there and with the two boys and asked them to describe Dr. Cook's journey to members of my party and myself. This they did in the manner stated below.

(Signed) R. E. PEARY.

SIGNED STATEMENT OF PEARY, BARTLETT, McMILLAN, BORUP AND HENSON, IN REGARD TO TESTIMONY OF COOK'S TWO ESKIMO BOYS.

The two Eskimo boys, I-took-a-shoo and Ah-pe-lah, who accompanied Dr. Cook while he was away from Anoratok in 1908 and 1909, were questioned separately and independently, and were corroborated by Panikpah, the father of one of them (I-took-a-shoo), who was personally familiar with the first third and the last third of their journey, and who said that the route for the remaining third, as shown by them, was as described to him by his son after his return with Dr. Cook.

Notes of their statements were taken by several of us, and no one of us has any doubt that they told the truth.

Their testimony was unshaken by cross-examination, was corroborated by other men in the tribe, and was elicited neither by threats nor promises, the two boys and their father talking of their journey and their experiences in the same way that they would talk of any hunting trip.

To go more into details: One of the boys was called in, and, with a chart on the table before him, was asked to show where he had gone with Dr. Cook. This he did, pointing out with his finger on the map, but not making any marks upon it.

As he went out, the other boy came in and was asked to show where he had gone with Dr. Cook. This he did, also without making any marks, and indicated the same route and the same details as did the first boy.

When he was through, Panikpah, the father of I-took-a-shoo, a very intelligent man, who was in the party of Eskimos that came back from Dr. Cook from the northern end of Nansen's Strait, who is familiar as a hunter with the Jones Sound region, and who has been in Commander Peary's various expeditions for some fifteen years, came in and indicated the same localities and details as the two boys.

Then the first boy was brought in again, and with a pencil he traced on the map their route, members of our party writing upon the chart where, according to the boy's statement, they had killed deer, bear, some of their dogs, seal, walrus and musk-oxen.

The second boy was then called in and the two went over the chart together, the second boy suggesting some changes as noted hereafter.

Finally, Panikpah, the father, was again called in to verify details of the portions of the route with which he was personally familiar.

The bulk of the boys' testimony was not taken by Commander Peary, nor in his presence, a fact that obviates any possible claim that they were awed by him.

Certain questions on independent lines from the direct narrative of the Eskimo boys were suggested by Commander Peary to some of us, and were put by us to the Eskimo boys.

Still later, Commander Peary asked the Eskimo boys two or three casual questions on minor points that had occurred to him.

During the taking of this testimony, it developed that Dr. Cook had told these boys, as he told Mr. Whitney and Billy Pritchard, the cabin boy, that they must not tell Commander Peary or any of us anything about their journey, and the boys stated Dr. Cook had threatened them if they should tell anything.

The narrative of these Eskimos is as follows:

They, with Dr. Cook, Francke and nine other Eskimos, left Anoratok, crossed Smith's Sound to Cape Sabine, slept in Commander Peary's old house in Payer Harbor, then went through Rice Strait to Buchanan Bay. After a few marches Francke and three Eskimos returned to Anoratok.

Dr. Cook, with the others, then proceeded up Flagler Bay, a branch of Buchanan Bay, and crossed Ellesmere Land through the valley pass at the head of Flagler Bay, indicated by Commander Peary in 1898, and utilized by Sverdrup in 1899, to the head of Sverdrup's "Bay Fiord" on the west side of Ellesmere Land.

Their route then lay out through this fiord, thence north through Sverdrup's "Hequerka Sound" and Nansen Strait.

On their way they killed musk-oxen and bear, and made caches, arriving eventually at a point on the west side of Nansen Strait (shore of Axel Heiberg Land of Sverdrup), south of Cape Thomas Hubbard.

A cache was formed here and the four Eskimos did not go beyond this point. Two others, Koolootingwah and Inughito, went on one more march with Dr. Cook and the two boys, helped to build the snow igloo, then returned without sleeping.

(These two Eskimos brought back a letter from Dr. Cook to Francke, dated the 17th of March. The two men rejoined the other four men who had been left behind, and the six returned to Anoratok, arriving May 7th. This information was obtained not from the two Eskimo boys, but from the six men who returned and from Francke himself, and was known to us in the summer of 1908, when the Roosevelt first arrived at Etah. The information is inserted here as supplementary to the narrative of the two boys.)

After sleeping at the camp where the last two Eskimos turned back, Dr. Cook and the two boys went in a northerly or northwesterly direction with two sledges and twenty odd dogs, one more march, when they encountered rough ice and a lead of open water. They did not enter this rough ice, nor cross the lead, but turned westward or southwestward a short distance and returned to Heiberg Land at a point west of where they had left the cache and where the four men had turned back.

Here they remained four or five sleeps, and during that time I-took-a-shoo went back to the cache and got his gun which he had left there, and a few items of supplies.

When asked why only a few supplies were taken from the cache, the boys replied that only a small amount of provisions had been used in the few days since they left the cache, and that their sledges still had all they could carry, so that they could not take more.

After being informed of the boys' narrative thus far, Commander Peary suggested a series of questions to be put to the boys in regard to this trip from the land out and back to it.

These questions and answers were as follows:

Did they cross many open leads or much open water during this time? Ans. None.

Did they make any caches out on the ice? Ans. No.

Did they kill any bear or seal while out on the ice north of Cape Thomas Hubbard? Ans. No.

Did they kill or lose any of their dogs while out on the ice? Ans. No.

With how many sledges did they start? Ans. Two.

How many dogs did they have? Ans. Did not remember exactly, but something over twenty.

How many sledges did they have when they got back to land? Ans. Two.

Did they have any provisions left on their sledges when they came back to land? Ans. Yes; the sledges still had about all they could carry, so they were able to take but a few things from the cache.

From here they then went southwest along the northwest coast of Heiberg Land to a point indicated on the map (Sverdrup's Cape Northwest).

From here they went west across the ice, which was level and covered with snow, offering good going, to a low island which they had seen from the shore of Heiberg Land at Cape Northwest. On this island they camped for one sleep.

The size and position of this island, as drawn by the first boy, was criticised by the second boy as being too large and too far to the west, the second boy calling the attention of the first to the fact that the position of the island was more nearly in line with the point where they had left Heiberg Land (Cape Northwest) and the channel between Amund Ringnes Land and Ellef Ringnes Land.

This criticism and correction was accepted by the first boy, who started to change the position of the island, but was stopped, as Commander Peary had given instructions that no changes or erasures were to be made in the route as drawn by the Eskimos on the chart.

From this island they could see two lands beyond (Sverdrup's Ellef Ringnes and Amund Ringnes Lands). From the island they journeyed toward the left hand one of these two lands (Amund Ringnes Land), passing a small island which they did not visit.

Arriving at the shore of Amund Ringnes Land, the Eskimos killed a deer as indicated on the chart.

The above italicised portion of the statement of the Eskimo boys covers the period of time in which Dr. Cook claims to have gone to the Pole and back, and the entire time during which he could possibly have made any attempts to go to it.

The answers of the Eskimo boys to Commander Peary's series of independent questions, showing that they killed no game, made no caches, lost no dogs, and returned to the land with loaded sledges, makes their attainment of the Pole on the trip North of Cape Thomas Hubbard a physical and mathematical impossibility, as it would demand the subsistence of three men and over twenty dogs during a journey of ten hundred and forty geographical miles on less than two sledge loads of supplies.

If it is suggested that perhaps Dr. Cook got mixed and that he reached the Pole, or thought he did, between the time of leaving the northwest coast of Heiberg Land at Cape Northwest, and his arrival at Ringnes Land, where they killed the deer, we must then add to the date of Dr. Cook's letter of March 17th, at or near Cape Thomas Hubbard, the subsequent four or five sleeps at that point, and the number of days required to march from Cape Thomas Hubbard to Cape Northwest (a distance of some sixty nautical miles), which would advance his date of departure from the land to at least the 25th of March, and be prepared to accept the claim that Dr. Cook went from Cape Northwest (about latitude eighty and a half degrees North) to the Pole, a distance of five hundred and seventy geographical miles, in twenty-seven days.

After killing the deer they then travelled south along the east side of Ringnes Land to the point indicated on the chart, where they killed another deer.

They then went east across the south part of Crown Prince Gustav Sea to the south end of Heiberg Land, then down through Norwegian Bay, where they secured some bears, but not until after they had killed some of their dogs, to the east side of Graham Island; then eastward to the little bay marked "Eld's Fiord" on Sverdrup's chart; then southwest to Hell's Gate and Simmon's Peninsula.

Here for the first time during the entire journey, except as already noted off Cape Thomas H. Hubbard, they encountered open water. On this point the boys were clear, emphatic, and unshakable. They spent a good deal of time in this region, and finally abandoned their dogs and one sledge, took to their boat, crossed Hell's Gate to North Kent, up into Norfolk Inlet, then back along the north coast of Colin Archer Peninsula to Cape Vera, where they obtained fresh eider duck eggs. Here they cut the remaining sledge off, that is shortened it, as it was awkward to transport with the boat, and near here they killed a walrus.

The statement in regard to the fresh eider duck eggs permits the approximate determination of the date at this time as about the first of July. (This statement also serves, if indeed anything more than the inherent straightforwardness and detail of their narrative were needed, to substantiate the accuracy and truthfulness of the boys' statement. This locality of Cape Vera is mentioned in Sverdrup's narrative as the place where during his stay in that region he obtained eider ducks' eggs.)

From Cape Vera they went on down into the southwest angle of Jones Sound, where they killed a seal; thence east along the south coast of the Sound, killing three bears at the point noted on the map, to the peninsula known as Cape Sparbo on the map, about midway on the south side of Jones Sound. Here they killed some musk-oxen and, continuing east, killed four more at the place indicated on the chart, and were finally stopped by the pack ice at the mouth of Jones Sound. From here they turned back to Cape Sparbo, where they wintered and killed many musk-oxen.

After the sun returned in 1909 they started, pushing their sledge, across Jones Sound to Cape Tennyson; thence along the coast to Clarence Head (passing inside of two small islands not shown on the chart, but drawn on it by the boys), where they killed a bear; thence across the broad bight in the coast to Cadogan Fiord; thence around Cape Isabella and up to Commander Peary's old house in Payer Harbor near Cape Sabine, where they found a seal cached for them by Panikpah, I-took-a-shoo's father. From here they crossed Smith Sound on the ice, arriving at Anoratok.

The accompanying map is reproduced exactly from the original submitted by Commander Peary with his official statement by which he hopes to prove that Dr. Frederick A. Cook never reached the north pole. The map purports to have been traced out in the presence of the two Eskimos who were with Dr. Cook and, according to Peary, is based upon their actual statements as to Cook's entire journey. The dotted lines in the small map in the upper left hand corner is the route which Dr. Cook says he took on his journey to and from the pole after leaving Cape Thomas Hubbard. The irregular line extending northeast from Isachsen Land is the edge of the land ice, beyond which, Peary declares, Dr. Cook did not venture.

We failed to mention in our last issue that C. R. Sawyer had returned to Butler from the west. After settling up his business affairs here he expects to shake the Indiana dirt from his feet and take up his residence in some of the western states. He has lost his mustache since leaving Butler, and it makes him appear ten years younger.

That the exhibition at the fair embraces the best obtainable in the various departments is evidenced by the fact that in the poultry department fowls which have taken everything wherever shown are on exhibition. Melroy and Webster, with the new breed, Partridge Plymouth Rocks, took firsts and seconds at Cleveland, Toledo, Indianapolis, Bryan, O., Indiana State fair and Indiana State Exhibit, Hicksville, O., and Detroit. The fowls possessed by these gentlemen are of the highest class, having every requisite of champions, and they have earned for their owners a good sum of money as well as a reputation. Melroy and Webster did not enter for premiums here but simply displayed their excellent fowls. Also in the poultry department are fowls from the Howard poultry farm at Fort Wayne, which have scored in Chicago and other large cities. The exhibit here is unquestionably great and should be greatly appreciated by the people.—Courier

George Coe, who taught school in Grant township, has gone to California, where he accepts a position under his brother Robert, who is installing the signal system on the Southern Pacific railway.

Saturday was hog day at Corunna and a big lot of porkers were sent east from that place. J. M. Fluch, who has become quite famous as a shipper, had charge. Farmers came in from all directions with loads of hogs. Each carload is said to have brought from $1,100 to $1,250.

Fort Wayne people are much concerned over loosing a big shoe heel factory. It is no doubt a great loss in that the demand for more and larger heels is growing rapidly. But one of these days some Paris beauty will lose her shoe heels and then the style will change and the shoe heel business will be a thing of the past, and we will have the heelless shoe, the hipless woman, and the horseless carriage, together with the childless home and the hairless dog.

Butler people turned out in large numbers last week to the Auburn fall festival, which has always been the case since the history of the two towns. Auburn, however does not do so well by Butler when there is a "doings" here. A citizen of this place recalls a time when Butler was holding one of her famous street fairs, and Auburn was expected to send over a large delegation. The band went to the train to meet the people when low and behold only two Auburnites stepped off.

H. E. Jackman, who conducts a fruit tree nursery near Waterloo, has awarded a complimentary premium to H. W. Emme, Jr., of east of Auburn, the gift coming as a consequence of the fact that Mr. Emme had on exhibition at the festival ten varieties of apples which were grown on his farm The premium, which was a number of fine fruit trees, had not been offered prior to the beginning of the fair, but Mr. Jackman, elated over the fact that Mr. Emme had so many varieties of apple trees, deemed him deserving of a special premium. It is considered a bit of rarity that one farmer has that number of varieties.

What came veay near to being a fatal accident happened at Waterloo Saturday morning when Henry Busse, of Goshen, cook for the Lake Shore pipe gang, was hit by a heavy mail bag thrown off a fast east bound mail train. Busse had just stepped out of the depot as the train went by and the flying bag struck him on the right leg, throwing him to the ground with great force. He was rendered unconscious and was carried into the depot by the telegraph operator. When he regained consciousness a physician was called who found that no bones were broken, but that his head and leg were badly bruised.

As is generally the case, the Auburn carnival was attended by crooks and pickpockets and several persons lost their pocket books and homes were broken open and robbed. The Courier has the following to say: "Pickpockets were in evidence in Auburn yesterday and several people were relieved of their purses as a consequence of the dastardly work of the crooks. The thieves forced their way into crowds near the interurban station and as the people were struggling to boar the cars they succeeded in securing the purses. William Getts, of Waterloo, was a victim of the men. They stole his purse, which contained $38. Mr. Getts was indignant over the affair, but there was no chance to identify the crooks. Alfred Kepler, also of Waterloo, was relieved of his purse containing $25. A smooth game was worked on him. The pickpocket crowded against Kepler and while so doing slipped the purse from his pocket. A purse containing some valuable papers was taken from John Baxter, no money, however, being in it."

Nothing Sensational

Some of the pencil pushers in nearby towns would have the people believe that there is something sensational in the way of politics in Butler. If there is it is behind the curtain, as we have failed to hear of anything of that nature up to the present time. The defeat of T. A. Hoffman by the democrats at their caucus, brought out Mr. Hoffman on an independent ticket, put so far there has been no dirty politics nor anything sensational. Mr. Dunten is not hailed here as a political boss, nor does he want the office of city attorney.

Dress Goods and Silk Department

This department of our business has always received unusal attention. This is necessitated by the frequent showings of styles demonstrated in the weave and pattern of goods in demand. We realize that unsatisfactory service in the fabric. After being made causes ill feeling on the part of the customer, and our selections have been made with a view to avoiding this as much as possible. We have never let the cost of the better service fabric deter us from placing it in our stock. You will find here this season those materials and shades which are most in demand, and quality considered. You may demand upon prices and value.

Hosiery and Knit Underwear Department.

Merchandise that fits, wears and is reasonable in price is the great difficulty in this class of goods.

Whether it's—Hosiery or Underwear, you are uncomfortable if you are not perfectly fitted; and you are dissatisfied unless you get good value for your money.

We have studied both these problems in connection with this department and we feel that we have the best fitting and the best wearing lines to be had in this country.

The Influence of Dress

THE BADLY DRESSED MAN

The man who feels that he is attracting amused or pitying observation, or exciting ironical or numerous critieism by the clothes he wears, is oppressed by the feeling that he is unable to to appear either oraceful or dignified, and depressed by a sense of consequent msignificance. His clothes cause him as much annoyance as a sore finger or a sore corn, irritate him to a display of bad manner, and demoralize him generally as though they wers in league with the devil.

THE WELL DRESSED MAN

The man into whose mind softly glides the consciousness that the clothes he wears are being admired and complimented by his associates, cannot help being pleased and feeling proud of himself. His heart will swell with self-satisfaction and self-confidence, and his opinion of himself will rapidly rise to a point considerably above par value. Life will seem so rose-colored to him and he will be on such good terms with himself, that he will be inspired to great thots and noble deeds.

Munyon's, 53d and Jefferson streets, Philadelphia, Pa

Visiting Day.

Mrs. A. was more shocked that amused when, in reply to her question, "Who was at Sunday school this morning;" her 4-year-old daughter said, "Everybody but Jesus."

"Why, my dear," said Mrs. A., "wherever did you get such an idea;"

"He was out visiting this morning," the little lady confidently said.

"Daughter," said Mrs. A., "who told you such a story?"

"Nobody didn't tell me, mother, but they just kept singing it over and over again: 'Jesus is calling, He's calling to-day.'"—Success Magazine.

Merely Postponed.

Mrs. Howlings (having freed her mind)—Why don't you answer me, if you can?

Mr. Howlings (helping himself to more meat)—It's unwholesome to quarrel while eating dinner, madam. I'll have good and plenty to say to you after a while.

NEW VIGOR FOR BAD BACKS.

How to Make a Weak Back Better.

Women who suffer with backache, bearing-down pains, dizziness, constant dull, tired feelings, will find hope in the advice of Mrs. M. Working, 315 Fulton Ave., Rochester, Ind., who said: "I suffered everything with pain in the back, too frequent passages of the kidney secretions, swelling of the ankles and joints and a general feeling of weakness. I used about everything said to be good for kidney trouble, but Doan's Kidney Pills brought me the first real help and three boxes cured me."

AGE NO BAR TO SUCCESS.

Enterprising 96-Year-Old Verifies the Truth of the Saying.

A man is no older than he feels is a saying that finds ample exemplification in the case of James Franklin Hyde, the youthful 96-year-old City Treasurer of Lincoln, Ill. Although he has long since passed the age when it is said that one's future is behind him, says Spare Moments, he has shown that when it comes to a mere matter of running for office he is as up to date as any of the youngsters of a later and supposedly smarter generation. When two years ago he was defeated for a fourth term for the office of City Treasurer, he said nothing, but quietly thought out his plan of campaign when the opportunity came to him for another chance.

Securing the nomination of the Citizens' Party, he contracted for advertising space in the daily papers of both parties, and ran a series of displayed advertisements calling attention to his superior qualifications for the office. He enlarged on the neatness and accuracy of his books, a fact which has attracted the attention of other record keepers all over the State. The fact that he was not so liable to errors as was this younger and less experienced opponent was pointed out. When the votes were counted it was found he was the only successful candidate on the ticket.

Mr. Hyde has always disdained giving a formula for longevity, except the admonition to create a habit of working regularly. While in the City Treasurer's office his time was so well applied that periods for spare moment work were plentiful. With the exact condition of every city fund at his fingers' and tongue's end, he considered his duty to the municipality fulfilled, and the remainder of his time he employed in keeping the books of a dozen or more small firms which could not employ individual bookkeepers.

CHILDREN SHOWED IT.

Effect of Their Warm Drink in the Morning.

"A year ago I was a wreck from coffee drinking and was on the point of giving up my position in the school room because of nervousness.

"I was telling a friend about it and she said, 'We drink nothing at meal time but Postum, and it is such a comfort to have something we can enjoy drinking with the children.'

"I was astonished that she would allow the children to drink any kind of coffee, but she said Postum was the most healthful drink in the world for children as well as for older ones, and that the condition of both the children and adults showed that to be a fact.

"My first trial was a failure. The cook boiled it four or five minutes and it tasted so flat that I was in despair but determined to give it one more trial. This time we followed the directions and boiled it fifteen minutes after the boiling began. It was a decided success and I was completely won by its rich, delicious flavor. In a short time I noticed a decided improvement in my condition and kept growing better and better month after month, until now I am perfectly healthy, and do my work in the school room with ease and pleasure. I would not return to the nerve-destroying regular coffee for any money."

IN MIDST OF NEW WONDERS WORLD HONORS HUDSON AND FULTON

The shades of Hudson and Fulton have recently been the guests of Father Knickerbocker. The tercentenary celebration of Henry Hudson's discovery of the beautiful stream that bears his name will live in history. Sharing honors with the old navigator and explorer was the man who, two centuries after the shallow Half Moon plumbed its way gingerly up what Hudson is supposed to have at first thought the northwest passage, navigated the same stream in a steamboat to the admiring gaze and fearsome participation of the venturesome bloods of a century ago.

What must the shades of these virile progressives of one and three centuries ago think of the panoply of progression unfolded on the Hudson and the North and East rivers in this twentieth century? The very pageant which opened the memorial celebration of discovery and invention was of such magnitude and variety as to cause even we mortals of the present to gasp when we pause to consider all the marvels of accomplishment it represented. No more fitting year could have been chosen by prearrangement and advanced preparation than the present one for such a memorial fete, writes Charles H. Leichliter in the Chicago Record-Herald. It has been a year of record smashing in almost every field of endeavor.

Less practical in its effect than would have been the fulfillment of Hudson's continual quest, a navigable north passage from the Atlantic to the Pacific, the accomplishment sought by adventurers for 400 years has been achieved. The north pole has been discovered. Men and women possessed of the same explorative restlessness as resulted in the name of Hudson dotting the geography of the western hemisphere have been busy scaling the highest mountain peaks. Another Englishman—for Hudson was a son of Great Britain despite the fact that his most notable achievements were made with the assistance of the Dutch—has traversed the difficult wastes of the antarctic to within 111 miles of the south pole. Records for globe circling have been broken. But while Peary, with his Roosevelt, a pigmy boat compared with the present ocean liners, but infinitely larger than the Half Moon, divides honors with his successful fellow explorer, Dr. Cook, it was not so much the accomplishments of these intrepid men and their kindred spirits that astounded the shades of Hudson and Fulton as the marvels of invention they witnessed.

An Age of Superlatives.

This is the age of electricity; of aviation; of annihilation of distance beyond the dreams of the veriest visionary. Before these virile spirits, on the mighty Hudson; about and beneath them on land and sea; above them in the air were the foremost examples of what their successors have been doing in the world they left so long ago. Nimble as these etherial inspectors, Curtiss and Wright navigate the air. These disembodied spirits must, from sheer surprise and force of human habit, have stepped agilely from the terrific approach of racing self-propelled vehicles; the brilliant light of electricity and its demon power must have astonished even the soul of the enterprising, far-seeing Fulton. And on the iron rails he could note the climax of the practical use of the steam he harnessed to his bidding on the same spot a century ago. For his part, the shade of Hudson must have gazed with wonder lighted eyes at the leviathans that plow the sea he loved. Ocean greyhounds that cross the Atlantic now in less days than it took him months on his first crossing reared their hulks high above the blue waters; their iron bellies buried in the depths a distance greater than the height of many stupendous buildings. Torpedo boats and submarines astonished the explorer's shade more than that of Fulton, for the inventor had experimented with these before his death, almost a century ago.

Advance in Battleships.

But to Hudson the long lines of the the maneuvering battleships of many nations must have been a source of professional admiration, surprise and regret that he could not be reincarnated in this age of so great possibilities to the nevigator. How he would have liked to tread their decks and immaculate bridges! What consternation would not he have poured into the Indians of Spuyten Duyvil or the mutineers of Hudson's Bay from their many embattled turrets.

Visiting the commanders of the various vessels, from the trim steam yachts or motor boats to the massive stepped battleships or the huge hulks of the Mauretania or the Lusitania the shades met surprises at every hand. Very frequently they were startled by a "cra-a-sh" snapping in the atmosphere about them, as invisible as their own disembodied spirits. Brave though he was, Hudson must have seized nervously the arm of his more modern companion and demanded: "What's that?" And Fulton, inventor and mechanic, no doubt confessed ignorance and turned to the shade of old Diedrich Knickerbocker, their guide, for enlightenment.

Let us go with them on their first twenty-four hours' inspection. Father Knickerbocker, being credited with maintaining a close watch upon the habits and progress of the inhabitants of his beloved Isle of Manhattan, was able to set their fears at rest, albeit he aggravated their wonder by explaining that the uncanny noise was made by wireless telegraph instruments.

"But what is the telegraph?" both asked.

"I had forgotten that you left before the invention of sending messages by means of a wire over thousands of miles of space. At first wires were necessary, and they still are generally used over land. But over water a system of sending and receiving messages across hundreds of miles of space with no visible connection is coming into very common use. Already it has saved the lives of many hundreds of shipwrecked people. By its use busy business men on ocean travels are able to keep in momentary communication with any part of the world they wish," explained the prototype of New York town.

"I remember something about Franklin with a kite and a key. He drew sparks from a string. That was a little while before I caught cold crossing from New Jersey and became a shade," said Fulton. "Is this new telegraphy anything like that?"

"Something similar, as it is accomplished by means of captive electricity," replied Father Knickerbocker. "Telephony is another invention whereby sounds are reproduced accurately over thousands of miles of wire, conversations between New York and Chicago and even greater distances being commonplace occurrences now."

"Chicago?" both inquired.

"Chicago," broke in another shade who bore resemblance to Father Dearborn, "is the greatest young city in the world. It is rapidly overhauling New York in population and is the center and source of most energy and progress."

Father Knickerbocker elevated his shade eyelids slightly, but refrained from comment.

"I had heard of electricity," ruminated the shade of Fulton. "There was something about it in Leyden while I was in England. But I did not dream it possessed such possibilities. It may have been a better element with which to experiment than steam. Still, nothing can supplant steam. I assume that all these people I see here to-day have come by steamships or maybe some have come by steam vehicles over the highways."

The shade of Father Dearborn emitted something strangely like a snort. "Yes, most of these people came by steam-propelled vehicles, but they now run on steel rails that girdle the world. They travel usually at a rate approximating nearly a mile a minute, and only this year a steam locomotive beat the record by running ninety-nine miles an hour. Every eighteen hours steam engines pulling long trains of steel-built cars and carrying hundreds of people go between Chicago and New York, and fourteen-hour trips over the same 1,000-mile journey are not unusual."

"Ye gods!" was all the shade of Fulton could exclaim.

"But that is not all," broke in Father Knickerbocker. "This vessel on which we now are, the Mauretania, crossed the Atlantic only a few weeks ago in just a little more than four days. How's that?" he chuckled, as he chucked the spirit ribs of Henry Hudson.

That shade, who had been listening somewhat listlessly to the conversation, became interested. "I was watching when our friend Robert, here, steamed up my river in the Clermont. It was a much larger boat, too, than my Half Moon, and made better time. But you could stow them both in this monster and have to look a long time to find them if they got misplaced."

"Yes," observed Father Knickerbocker, "you could almost put either of them in one of those smokestacks. A coach and four could easily be driven through one of these funnels."

Electricity's Aid Used.

They were leaning over the rail, and both the ancient shades became interested in a smaller vessel that was driving alongside without apparent means of propulsion. Only a faint "chug! chug!" came to their ears.

"That," said Father Knickerbocker, observing their attention, "is another use to which electricity has been put. With all your study of torpedoes and submarines you never thought of such a thing as an electric launch, did you, Robert?"

"Electricity is used, too, on railroads. This year an electric motor made a record of ninety-two miles an hour. Electric wires from the bridge of this ship to the engine room convey the orders for its movements. Electric bells in the cabins summon servants, as they do in the thirtieth-story room of the hotel in which you would sleep to-night if a shade needed to sleep. But let us pass along. We have only a few days to witness the wonders that have been produced by men since you last visited the scene of your greatest achievements."

Swinging lightly over the side of the great vessel the party, including Father Dearborn, floated to the deck of a passing launch.

"Phew!" exclaimed the shade of Hudson, as it applied a Styx-embroidered handkerchief to its nostrils. "What is that unseemly smell?"

"That is the gasoline," vouchsafed Father Dearborn. "They're very familiar with it on the principal thoroughfares of my big western city."

"And what is gasoline?" queried the shade of Fulton.

"Father Knick" Up to Date.

"You should keep better posted on the progress of the world, my dear Robert," observed Father Knickerbocker. "See how I have kept myself informed of what is going on in New Amsterdam, which the British renamed New York. Petroleum was discovered in your native state of Pennsylvania some years after you cast aside your mundane existence and affected the filmy habiliments of the spirit world. Gasoline is one of the results, and right prominent it has become as a fuel. It is largely used for the propulsion of automobiles and boats, and has become a means of economy and large possibilities in shops and other places where steam is inexpedient and costly."

On the battleship Connecticut, where the visitors from the Styx next took up their observations, both Hudson and Fulton found much to interest them. The huge guns of enormous tonnage, handled rapidly and smoothly by the aid of mechanical devices all new to the ancient mariners, filled them with wonder. "The powder burned in the firing of one salute would have outfitted the Half Moon for its entire voyage of discovery," observed Hudson.

See Two Familiar Craft.

About them the harbor and the rivers were dotted with craft of every description. Finally they spied two that were familiar—the replicas of the Half Moon and the first Clermont, reproduted as a mere incident of the tercentennial celebration. The originals had represented the climax of reckless expenditure three and one centuries back.

At the conclusion of the parade Father Knickerbocker led his guests back to the city's heart. Hudson's bewilderment was far greater than that of Fulton. "When I was here this was all hills and trees and rocks," exclaimed the old explorer, as he gazed upward to where Madison Mary was tolling the hour, thirty stories above them, with several more stories of tower stretching above her sonorous mouth.

"When I was here," observed Fulton, "a four-story building was thought a very tower of Babel. But there are some familiar scenes."

Just then there came a furious "Honk! Honk!" and Father Knickerbocker and Father Dearborn stepped aside just in time to see a huge racing car pass directly through the shades of Hudson and Fulton.

"What was that?" inquired the guests as they caught the Stygian breaths. "That," explained Father Knickerbocker, solicitously fanning the habiliments of his charges with his spirit hand, "was the automobile that recently did ten miles in 8:23 1-5. Lucky it wasn't the one that made 100 miles in 1:38:48 4-10. You would have been wafted back to the Styx."

"But what has become of the horses?" both inquired.

"There's some out in Central Park yet," replied Father Knickerbocker.

"There are still plenty to be seen on the streets of Chicago," observed Father Dearborn, wryly.

Year of Broken Records.

"But even in this respect it has become a very rapid world," continued Father Knickerbocker, ignoring the interruption. "This year a horse, Hamburg Belle, trotted a one-mile heat in 2:01¼."

"Good for the horse," exclaimed Fulton.

"Even your record of getting away from the Indians up Albany way has been eclipsed this year," said Father Knickerbocker, looking through Hudson. "Early this month Emelio Lunghi clipped three and three-fifths seconds from the 700-yard running record that had stood for twenty-seven years, making it in 1:27 2-5; John J. Eller won a 120-yard low hurdle race in 0:14 2-5, a fifth of a second faster than the best previous record, made in 1888; Platt Adams leaped in a standing hop, skip and jump the unprecedented distance of 32 feet 4½ inches, breaking the world's record by several inches."

"Blessed if it isn't a rapid century," ejaculated the visiting shades.

They were standing beside a huge stone and iron structure. Suddenly there came a buzz of noise, and under their feet the earth trembled.

"Is it an earthquake?" tremulously asked Hudson.

Wonders of Printing.

"No, old friend," Father Knickerbocker assured him. "That is only newspaper presses printing miles of colored prints telling about this day's doings in honor of both of you. They're coming out folded and ready for the street at the rate of thousands a minute. While we are standing here boys are already selling them on the streets. Within an hour a million people will be looking at your ancient pictures and reading of your achievements; comparing them smilingly with those of this very modern world."

Hudson and Fulton were silent. Then Fulton spoke up. "They were printed by hand in my time," he said. "Taree or four hundred an hour was a remarkable record, even for the press of Ben Franklin."

"There was mighty little printing in my day," observed Hudson, "even in Holland or Germany."

"Electricity again makes it possible to-day. The presses, larger than many houses, are operated by electric motors; electricity flashes the news from all corners of the world, so that within a few minutes of the occurrence of an important event, in any part of the globe the rest of the world may know about it, and be shown printed pictures of either the people concerned or photographic representations of the disaster, or battle, or notable achievement."

They caught the flaring headlines of a pictured page in the hands of a flying newsboy. "That looks like me," exclaimed Hudson. "That's my likeness," said Fulton. "There was nothing like that in our time," they dueted.

And Then Flying Machines.

Even as they stood agape a shadow obscured the light flickering through the top of the canyon of skyscrapers, and, looking up, they saw in majestic flight a huge bird-like shape. They easily could discern in its center the figure of a man, and faintly came to their ears the chug of a panting engine.

"That is the latest and most marvelous achievement of any in the twentieth century," Father Knickerbocker stated calmly. "That is either the Curtiss or Wright aeroplane, flying from Governor's Island over Manhattan and the Bronx. These bird machines have taken on the spirit of the age, and man already has flown at the rate of forty-nine miles an hour. He has been able thus far to remain in the air in a heavier than air machine more than three hours, and dirigible balloons, lighter than air, commonly travel from 150 to 450 miles. The possibilities of either form of flying machine have not as yet begun to be developed."

The shades of Hudson and Fulton fell over in amazement and were run over by a motorcycle.

"What hit us, then?" they asked impatiently.

How the bicycle had been succeeded by the motor driven two-wheeled vehicle was explained to them, and they were told of another recent world-smashing record in which a motorcycle carrying two men went a mile in 42 3-5 seconds this year.

"I guess I'll go back home," observed Hudson. "This is too swift a place for me."

"Let's wait a little longer," said Fulton. "I always was interested in inventions."

Under Ocean in Submarine.

They were taken to the bottom of the ocean in a submarine and shown how a man may be shot from a sunken vessel at a great depth, to the surface of the water; how vessels may be rammed below the water line; how torpedoes may be projected against them; how battles may be fought beneath the water or above the land and sea.

"It looks to me," observed Hudson with decision, "that, with these big guns and ships, the uncertainty of submerged fighting and battles in the air, this is no place for a fighting man or a warring nation."

"Right you are," agreed his three companions.

At night they were treated to more surprises. Serpentine figures in various colors leaped out of the darkness of the overhead night.

"Electricity again," Father Knickerbocker told them.

They expressed surprise that so many candles and gas lights should be available in their honor. Again they were assured that little of the illumination was gas, and none of it candles, but again electricity. Fulton recalled gas lights in London, but these were dim compared with the brilliance of the electric incandescents and arcs. The prism colors of the lights he was assured were produced by the perfection of glass manufacture. Everywhere the returned voyagers were greeted with the possibilities and modern uses of one manufactured product with which they thought they had been familiar in their own times.

Electric Elevators.

Mirrored electric elevators shot them skyward with more rapidity than their etherealized bodies were accustomed to travel.

"Perhaps we'd better stay and see it out," said Hudson dubiously.

"As long as steam still is supreme as a motive power I think I can afford to remain," declared Fulton.

"After all, if it hadn't been for me and the Half Moon and my surly crew this wonder country and its wonderful achievements might not yet be "the vision of the world," said Hudson.

And Father Knickerbocker and Father Dearborn chuckled with pride.

NEW TELEGRAPH COMPANY

Pushing Lines of Wires Across Missouri, Illinois and Indiana.

The quiet contest for a place in the telegraph business which has been in progress for some time in Missouri, Illinois and Indiana, has resulted in a complete victory for the new independent company, the Telepost. Wherever its lines have been established it has put into effect its universal schedule of flat rates, which mean a reduction of telegraph charges such as only this new company can give without loss of money through the use of the inventions of Patrick B. Delaney, by which remarkable automatic machines do the work of the old hand method of transmission.

The Telepost Company is bringing competition into the heart of the zones of the greatest volume of telegraph business, viz.: New England, the North Mississippi Valley region, and the Washington, Philadelphia, New York belt. The lines are established and thriving in New England, work is going ahead with all possible speed in and around New York, and now in the North Central district, in which the main centers are Chicago, St. Louis, Springfield, Indianapolis and Kansas City, another victory has been gained by securing extensions into Indianapolis for the line now operating from St. Louis to Terre Haute. In a few weeks' time Indianapolis and St. Louis and Indianapolis and Chicago will be connected. Westward the work is pushing on beyond Sedalia, Mo.

The effect of a sharp competition and reduced rates, as evidenced in New England, has been to stimulate business, and justifies the conclusion that experts are correct in their opinion that with the rates cut in half the telegraph business will be trebled in volume, which has been the general experience in England, France and other countries where the telegraphs have been put on a basis of modern efficiency and reasonable charges.

A Lesson in Logic.

It is only within the memory of living man that legislation has undertaken to protect domestic animals from the cruelty of their owners. Ownership was held to be absolute by most, but there was one man in England a hundred years ago who could demonstrate the untenable nature of this theory. This man was Thomas Erskine, one of the greatest lawyers and advocates of his age. A tradition survives at Hampstead, the residence of Lord Erskine, which Mr. Charles G. Harper has put into his book, "Rural Nooks Round London," and which shows how this legal authority would have administered more recent laws.

It is related that the celebrated Lord Erskine, walking one day on Hampstead Heath, saw a ruffianly driver shamefully thrashing a miserably ill-cared-for horse.

My lord remonstrated with the driver on the cruelty of it; whereupon the fellow retorted, "It's my own; mayn't I use it as I please?" and started whacking the wretched animal worse than ever.

Erskine, greatly annoyed, laid his walking-stock over the shoulders of the offender, who, crouching and grumbling, asked my lord—this is the drawing-room version, not a verbatim report, which would read rather differently—what business he had to touch him with the stick.

"Why?" said Erskine, "the stick's my own; mayn't I use it as I please?"

The young man bent forward.

"Wait a moment, Herbert," said Amelia, producing an implement a few inches long, shaped like a tennis racket, made of silver and specially prepared silk gauze, and holding it up before her lips. "Now, Herbert."

Then they took their first disinfected kiss.—Chicago Tribune.

THE LEGEND OF THE PINE

Benaiah ben Jehoidah, he that led
The armored host of Solomon, bent low
Before that ancient king. "My lord," he said,
"For leagues on leagues beyond the Jordan's flow
I sought the priceless gift that now I bear
To thee, beloved master. Lo! within
This cup of golden beryl sparkle fair
Those drops that fell before the world knew sin—
The Dews of Life, a draft whereof shall give Immortal youth—eternal, deathless spring—
To him that drains their essence. Drink! and live Forever, Shield of Judah!" And the king,
The noble beaker taking, paused a space
To dream, as old men will; then, musing, spoke:
"To live forever! So, when all my race
Hath passed away, alone to bear the yoke
Of earthly care? When none is left alive
Of those I love, of those whom even now
My heart desires? What! Shall I survive
All, all my friends, such perfect friends as thou,
True, gallant soldier? Nay. The sacred lands
Let others rule; my days are growing few;
Man's life belongs in God's almighty hands;
And thus—I do as God would have me do!"
He turned the cup; the precious drops were flung
Upon the sands, and where with life divine
They touched the barren waste, in beauty sprung
That faithful tree, the never-fading pine.
—Youth's Companion.

THE OLD SWIMMING HOLE

The conference at Conway had been brief. The man from the city had met the disabled master of railways and talked with him for a brief hour, and then the eminent physician had called a halt and ordered his patient back to his bath and his bed.

The man from the city had virtually completed his work, however. He was the sick man's successor, self-appointed, it is true, but with none to contest his claim.

He was conscious when he shook the old captain of industry by the hand, that it might be for the last time, and the feeling added an unaccustomed tenderness to his parting words.

The man from the city had anticipated a two days' stay. He had used but one. And then a sudden whim seized him. The village where he had spent his boyhood, the old home he had never revisited, was but twenty miles away. It was not on the railway line, but he could rent a conveyance of some kind, perhaps an automobile. Anyway, he had made up his mind to see the village again.

It was a mild curiosity that prompted him. He had no old friends to reward. No grudges to settle. Yes, there was one.

He felt a sudden wave of bitterness cross his mind. It was absurd, of course—the thing had happened so long ago. But the anger was still there—anger against the man who had robbed him of Lucy Dalton's love.

He knew he had been robbed. He had found it out when too late. John Ingram had slandered him to the girl, and had brought up in his disfavor a cruel untruth. And Lucy had married John Ingram and all the world had grown dark and hollow for Jim Atherton.

He laughed at himself for his romantic folly, and yet despite the years that had elapsed those moments of anguish seemed very real.

He laughed again when he reflected that this bitter disappointment had been the making of him. If he had married Lucy Dalton he would have settled down in Winsted and might today be a plodding old rheumatic farmer. As it was, the loss of the girl he had loved had driven him to the great city and to-day his was a name that all men were forced to respect and many men feared.

Yet, unworthy as the thought seemed to him, he felt that it would please him to know that John Ingram had not prospered, and he had a keen desire to meet his false friend and remind him of his perfidy.

"Seeing poor old Barton has made me sentimental," he growled. "What has Jim Atherton to do with old homes and early loves? Just the same I'm going over."

He stayed all night at the hotel, and after breakfast secured an automobile to carry him across the ridge.

It was a pleasant ride, clear and cool, and Jim Atherton enjoyed it in his quiet way. He remembered walking over the same road the day he had turned his back forever on Winsted. Yes, there was the grist mill where the farmer had given him a lift. How well he recalled the sleek span of horses. He was a kind old man and had shown a friendly interest in the adventurous boy. Jim Atherton suddenly wished he could do something for the man who had extended the first helping hand to him in his earliest venture, but no doubt he had been dead many years.

"Pretty country," said the chauffeur.

"Yes," his passenger agreed.

"Ever this way before?"

"Not for many years."

"It doesn't change," said the chauffeur.

A moment later they came within sight of a white steeple and a cluster of houses nestling among the trees.

"That's Winsted," said the chauffeur. "It's too sound asleep to ever wake up."

Jim Atherton looked around.

"You may let me off here," he said. "I'll walk down the hill. I'm not going back to Conway. I'll reach the railway on the other side.

He pushed some bills into the chauffeur's hand and walked briskly down the hill.

The chauffeur stared at the money and then at the retreating figure.

"Who in blazes can the old chap be?" he muttered. He looked again at the money. "He's too good a proposition for Conway to lose."

Then he regretfully turned the car and started on the return journey.

Jim Atherton sniffed the morning air. It seemed to have a familiar odor. There was something ozonic about it that put new life into his cramped legs. It gave a fresh briskness to his gait.

Yes, there was the old butternut grove where the farmer had caught him and made him saw wood. He laughed aloud at his early discomfiture. And there was the old schoolhouse—no, this was a newer building. But the maple trees were the same and the noisy stream where he went fishing for shiners and bullheads, was still there. He could hear it brawling along behind the bushes on the lower level.

A man was sitting on the top rail of a nearby fence. He was a limp looking man and his attitude suggested an extreme degree of comfort. He was a man of perhaps forty, with pale blue eyes and a straggling growth of red whiskers. Jim Atherton hailed this wayside figure.

"Good morning," he said as he paused and removing his hat let the cool breeze lift his gray hair.

The pale blue eyes surveyed him leisurely.

"'Mornin'."

"Fine weather."

"Yes, but we need rain."

"Lived here long?"

"Born over there on th' Potter section."

"This your farm?"

"Nope. This is Ab Coleman's farm. I'm hirin' out to him. Ab's down in th' village with a load o' stuff."

Jim Atherton faintly smiled. He fancied the genus hired man had changed but little.

"I suppose you know pretty nearly everybody in the valley?"

"Guess I do. There ain't 'nough newcomers to bother me."

"Then, of course, you know all the old families?"

The pale blue eyes half closed.

"What you sellin'?"

Jim Atherton suddenly laughed.

"Nothing that Winsted would buy," he answered.

"There was a feller here, writin' up th' history of th' village once," said the hired man. "You got your picter an' some stuff written 'bout you in th' book for five dollars. Bill Quigg paid him, an' Rodney Gear, and Sile Barnes, an' mebby some others. Feller put up at th' tavern fer a week an' then him an' th' money he'd collected, an' Sam Henderson's board bill, an' Tod Brown's livery bill, all went away together an' never came back."

He laughed noiselessly, and Jim Atherton laughed, too.

"I don't write histories," he said and laughed again. "Perhaps I've done a little something toward making history of a certain sort, but there were no unpaid bills."

The owner of the blue eyes accepted the statement with a tranquil air.

"How'd you get over here?" he asked.

"I came in an automobile from Conway."

The straggly red whiskers suddenly quivered.

"I want to know," said their owner. "Anythin' give out?"

"Nothing."

"There was a feller come through here las' September or mebby it was later—an' somethin' give out with his machine, and Tom Sturges—he's th' blacksmith—was workin' on it four hours. He charged th' feller two-an'-a-half an' Dave Pitts says he paid Tom from a roll o' bills as big as your arm."

Jim Atherton nodded.

"No doubt he needed it all. Any amusements in Winsted?"

"Nothin'. Jes' a Sunday School picnic in the grove, an' a church fair in th' winter. Boys tried to org'nize a brass band, but it fell through." His blue eyes suddenly brightened. "There's goin' to be a circus nex' week over to Monticello an' they say it's a clipper."

"You are going, of course?"

"I guess I be. I dunno. A lot o' th' boys are talkin' of goin' over together."

Jim Atherton produced a silver dollar and passed it up to the man on the fence.

"Get a good seat," he laughingly said. "And don't forget the red lemonade."

The straggly red whiskers quivered again and the pale blue eyes scrutinized the dollar closely.

"I'll be dummed," he muttered and slid the coin into his trousers pocket.

"You say you know all the old Winsted families," Jim Atherton remarked. "Do you know a man named Ingram, John Ingram?"

"Yep. Know him well. John Ingram lives th' other side o' th' village on th' Ingram farm. He's pooty badly crippled up with rheumatiz. Can't do much of anythin' 'cept hobble round. Old Doc Peasely says he won't be no better here. Only hope for him is to git out to Collyrado where it's dryer than it is here—but I dunno as he can afford to go—not, anyway, till he can sell his farm—an' nobody wants it."

"Is he alone there?"

"He's got his son, Phil, with him. Phil's doin' th' work. He's a pooty good boy, Phil is—mebby a mite stuck up, but not so you'd notice it much. An' he's mighty good to his old dad. The boy's mother was dee-termined he should have a college eddication an' he got it—though how she managed it I can't understand. But it ain't doin' him any good. He's jest tied down thar to the old man an' the farm."

Jim Atherton stirred uneasily.

"And the boy's mother?"

"She died 'bout four years ago."

The man from the city put on his hat.

"Thank you," he said. "Good-by."

"Good-by," drawled the man on the fence. He looked after his retreating figure. Then he drew his silver coin from his pocket and bit on it. Evidently satisfied with the test he slipped the dollar back and grinned until his blue eyes were almost closed.

Jim Atherton went down the main street to the old tavern and drank a glass of buttermilk, and asked about his lunch and the means of transportation to Monticello, the nearest railway town. And after he had sat on the old porch a while and half dozed in the sleepy atmosphere, he ate the simple fare that the tavern provided, and started out for a walk.

The air was warm and he walked slowly. Somehow he turned toward the Ingram farm. He remembered that the old swimming hole in the Fourmile creek, a favorite resort in that boyhood time, was just off the road in the ravine and close to the line of the old farm. He would visit the ancient resort.

It hadn't changed. It was still the same quiet, shaded spot. He dipped his fingers in the water. It was just of a proper coolness.

Jim Atherton was fond of the water. He had been a clever swimmer when he was a boy. It was an art he had practiced whenever opportunity offered. At the seaside resorts he had visited he always improved the chances for his favorite sport.

A sudden desire to get into the water came to him. He looked around. The place was absolutely quiet and deserted.

He rapidly removed his clothes and laid them on the big flat stone he had used for the same purpose seven-and-twenty years before.

Then he slipped into the water.

It gave him a pleasant sensation. The temperature seemed exactly right. He waded out to the deeper places and presently found himself swimming easily and lightly.

The old swimming hole had lost none of its alluring charms.

He was floating on his back looking up at the interlacing branches of the trees, and the patches of bright blue sky beyond, and the drifting white clouds, when, without warning, his legs were seized by a terrible constriction. He tried to kick it off. He was powerless. He felt himself sinking and uttered a wild cry of terror.

He knew what had seized him. It was cramp. His mind was quite clear despite the drumming in his ears. He realized that he was drowning. He wondered how the "street" would take it, and what the papers would say. He offered no resistance as the waters drew him down. His head roared; there was fire before his eyes.

Then he was fighting and struggling. He struck out with his clenched hands. He clung madly to the dark thing that was attacking him.

The next thing he remembered was the sound of a pleasant voice. He was lying on the soft sod beside the swimming hole with his face downward. Somebody was rubbing him briskly with a coarse towel.

"You're coming back all right," said the pleasant voice. "Lie still until I get the circulation going. I fancy the cramp has gone. It was lucky I saw you leaving the road. And it was lucky, too, that I heard you call for help. You were in the deepest hole of all, and you gave me a hard fight for a moment or two. But you're all right. There. Now you can put on your clothes. No symptoms of a chill, eh?"

He was a fine looking young fellow, clear eyes and dark haired, alert and quick and cheery. He brought Jim Atherton his clothes and helped him dress.

"Sit here in the sun until you are warm through," he said. "Now you are looking yourself again."

The rescued man found his voice.

"Fine boy," he murmured. "Fate sent a worthy messenger. It's a good thing she didn't send a laggard. But, boy, you are dripping. Take care of yourself. Don't mind me."

"I'm all right," laughed the young man, "I warmed up working over you. I've a coat on the fence yonder, and I'll slip it on—and when my shoes are a little drier I'll slip them on, too."

Jim Atherton eagerly watched him.

"Boy," he said, "a good many people will think you have done a good afternoon's work. I confess I'm one of them. Give me your hand." He took the young man's hand and stared into his face. "You need not tell me your name. It is Philip Ingram."

The young man started.

"That is a very good guess," he said.

"It is not a guess," Jim Atherton answered. "I knew your mother." He paused a moment. "Twenty-seven years ago—and to-day her son saves my life."

The young man had drawn back a little. Now he came nearer.

"May I ask your name, sir?"

"James Atherton."

"Why, why," cried the young man, "you once lived here! And you knew the old swimming hole. Of course, of course. I've heard of you very often, sir. The village is quite proud of you. You are really the Mr. James Atherton of—of Wall street?"

The financier slowly smiled.

"I think I am the Atherton you mean."

"Then," said the young man, "I have a packet for you."

"A packet?"

"Yes. It is at the house. My mother gave it to me just before—before she died. It contains all the letters you sent to her when you were children together. She wanted me to give it into your hands some time, and say to you that she had not forgotten."

There was a little silence.

"I want the packet," said Jim Atherton slowly, "and I want you."

The young man started and drew back.

"Wait," said Atherton. "I am doing this not so much for you as for your mother's memory. I know she would wish it. She gave you an education to fit you for better things. It is in my power to help you, to develop you, to make a useful and influential man of you. I have no son. I am alone in the world."

The face of the young man was pale.

"No," he said, "I cannot accept. I have a father who needs me."

"I know about your father," said Atherton. "I know about the Western journey he is advised to take. Here." He quickly drew money from his pocket and thrust it into the young man's hands. "That's an advance on your salary. You will take your father to Colorado. You will see that he is comfortably settled. You will provide everything for him that he needs. And then you will come to me. Is it a promise?"

The young man hesitated a moment longer.

"Yes," he said, "I promise."

"Now bring me the packet," said Jim Atherton.—Pennsylvania Grit.

9,000,000 DESCENDANTS.

President Garfield Figured Charlemagne Had That Number.

Second Assistant Secretary of State Adee, who is as irremovable from his job as Secretary of Agriculture Wilson, gets as much fun out of life as anybody. There never has been a man in the State Department who knew so much offhand about titles, precedents, and all the little angularities that go to make a study of reigning houses practical, romantic and interesting as Secretary Adee. However, he makes his routine life worth the living by seeing the funny side of everything, and taking an optimistic view of that which lacks humor.

Recently the Secretary was discussing with a friend the claims of a certain prince of Africa to recognition. "I have no doubt this man is descended from King Solomon and the Queen of Sheba," said the Secretary.

"It is entirely possible. I remember once a caller told President Garfield that he was descended from Charlemagne. 'Let's see,' said the President, 'Charlemagne has been dead about 1,000 years. Allowing 30 years to a generation, which is generous, that would mean over 30 generations, and calculating at the usual rate of increase in families, I should say there ought to be about 9,000,000 people in the world by this time who have the blood of Charlemagne in their veins. It's highly probable you are quite right,' concluded the President.

"That reminds me," continued Mr. Adee, "we have quite a number of descendants from passengers of the old Mayflower by this time. I should say, figuring it out as President Garfield did, there must be about 1,000,000 scattered all the way from Florida to Alaska and from Maine to California. One day Secretary John Hay was talking to a friend, and the friend asked him if he was descended from any one who came on that famous ship. 'I don't know,' responded Mr. Hay, 'but I will have an expert look it up.' An expert was called in, and the next day reported back that Secretary Hay was duly descended, on his maternal side, from a Mayflower pioneer."—Chicago News.

Just in Time.

A German shoemaker left the gas turned on in his shop one night, and upon arriving in the morning struck a match to light it. There was a terrific explosion, and the shoemaker was blown out through the door almost to the middle of the street.

A passerby rushed to his assistance and after helping him to arise inquired if he was injured.

The little German gazed in at his place of business, which was now burning quite briskly, and said:

"No, I aindt hurt. But I got out shust in time. Eh?"—Lippincott's.

CHILD ATH CUTICURA.

Spread Whole Box of It on Crackers—Not the Least Injury Resulted—Thus Proven Pure and Sweet.

A New York friend of Cuticura writes:

"My three year old son and heir, after being put to bed on a trip across the Atlantic, investigated the stateroom and located a box of graham crackers and a box of Cuticura Ointment. When a search was made for the box, it was found empty and the kid admitted that he had eaten the contents of the entire box spread on the crackers. It cured him of a bad cold and I don't know what else."

No more conclusive evidence could be offered that every ingredient of Cuticura Ointment is absolutely pure, sweet and harmless. If it may be safely eaten by a young child, none but the most beneficial results can be expected to attend its application to even the tenderest skin or youngest infant.

WAGNER'S STORMY BEGINNING.

Comfort Came to Composer from Patronage of Mad Monarch.

"A fugitive for debt and refused a job in a chorus, a despised and abhorred and unheard composer, a political exile, then a stormy crusader against the widest and wildest campaign of abuse and ridicule in the history of art, then the most successful composer that ever lived, and finally again a political exile because he had become so powerful that he was called the pope of music—this is a scenario of the life of Wagner," says Rupert Hughes in Smith's.

"Though he chose music as his career and music is ordinarily the most aloof from reality of all the arts, he brought it into intimate contact with nearly every phase of human activity. Through his music he invaded the drama, fiction, essay, poetry, mythology, religion, legend, history, politics, revolution, finance, architecture, painting.

"In the last article we followed Wagner's life to the peak he reached with his overpoweringly beautiful romance, "Tristan and Isolde." This opera was composed when Wagner was 46, but he was 51 before it was produced.

"Meanwhile, when his financial affairs were in most desperate straits and he had borrowed nearly all that men like Liszt could scrape up to lend him, he was visited by one of those fairy-story happenings that brighten real life once or twice a century. The king of Bavaria, Ludwig II., a madman with streaks of genius, became interested in his music and sent for him. So obscure was Wagner that the messenger was six months in finding him, and had almost despaired when he discovered him in Stuttgart and informed him that he had been put upon the pension list with a yearly stipend of about $500. In Wagner's words: 'My creditors were quieted and I could go on with my work.'"

BEAUTIFUL ANTIQUITIES.

Beads Found in Egypt Which Would be Fashionable To-day.

Among the fascinating collection of antiquities found by the officers of the Egypt exploration fund and now on view at King's College, in the Strand, London, is a unique bowl with four hippopotami on the rim, a triumph of pottery work for the period. The animals are beautifully molded and are in a wonderful state of preservation. Yet the bowl was made nearly 7,000 years ago. There are beads in plenty, a few of gold and silver, some of amber and many of carnelian. One long string of the last named would be quite fashionable now. From the grave of a hunter were taken several weapons, mostly of stone and flint, but also a copper harpoon, which is of the greatest interest. A clay gaming board with eighteen squares and twelve men show that "draughts" is a very ancient institution.

Of a later period, 3500 B. C., is the skull of a long-horned ox found at the bottom of a shaft of a grave, where it had been placed with one of the haunches as an offering. The central teeth of both sides of the lower jaw are worn down, as by a bit. The horse was unknown at that period. There is quite a quantity of hair on the skull, showing that the animal was a blond.

Afraid of Ghosts

Many people are afraid of ghosts. Few people are afraid of germs. Yet the ghost is a fancy and the germ is a fact. If the germ could be magnified to a size equal to its terrors it would appear more terrible than any fire-breathing dragon. Germs can't be avoided. They are in the air we breathe, the water we drink.

The germ can only prosper when the condition of the system gives it free scope to establish itself and develop. When there is a deficiency of vital force, languor, restlessness, a sallow check, a hollow eye, when the appetite is poor and the sleep is broken, it is time to guard against the germ. You can fortify the body against all germs by the use of Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery. It increases the vital power, cleanses the system of clogging impurities, enriches the blood, puts the stomach and organs of digestion and nutrition in working condition, so that the germ finds no weak or tainted spot in which to breed. "Golden Medical Discovery" contains no alcohol, whisky or habit-forming drugs. All its ingredients printed on its outside wrapper. It is not a secret nostrum but a medicine OF KNOWN COMPOSITION and with a record of 40 years of cures. Accept no substitute—there is nothing "just as good." Ask your neighbors.

Opening of Cheyenne River Indian Reservation in South Dakota

Registration Dates, Oct. 4 to 23, inclusive.

The General Land Office at Washington has designated Le Beau and Aberdeen, So. Dak., on the Minneapolis & St. Louis R. R. as registration points.

Le Beau, which is the Missouri River terminus of the Minneapolis & St. Louis R. R., is located on the Missouri River, opposite the Reservation, and is the nearest railroad station to three-fifths of the land.

Aberdeen, the other registration point, is the chief city in northern South Dakota.

These points are reached best by the Iowa Central and Minneapolis & St. Louis R. R. lines.

There will be about 14,000 quarter sections allotted to settlers. The land lays well for farming over most of the reservation. The soil is a light loam and is very fertile. It is similar to that in the counties east of the River, where the land sells from $25.00 to $30.00 per acre. Lignite coal is found over a great part of the reservation.

Who May Secure a Homestead—Under the homestead laws of the United States, any person, male or female who is not the owner of more than 160 acres of land in any state or territory, who is a native born citizen of the United States, or has been naturalized, or declared his intention to become a naturalized citizen of the United States (i. e., one who has taken out his first papers of citizenship), who is over the age of 21 years or the head of a family, may make a homestead entry of not exceeding 160 acres of any of the unoccupied lands of the United States.

SPOHR'S VIOLIN FOUND.

New Yorker Believes He Has Solved a Mystery of a Century.

Louis Blumenberg of New York tells me he has found the famous Spohr violin in London, a London correspondent of the New York Herald says. The story of this renowned fiddle and its loss is one of the romances of music.

Louis Spohr, the greatest artist of his day, was traveling through Germany in 1804, with a friend, Herr Eck. Spohr had his trunk, containing all his personal effects, with his beloved violin, carefully lashed to the back of the coach on the way to Gottingen. There were numerous highway robbers in those districts in those days, and a certain variety of "luggage lifter" bearing some resemblance to the modern gentleman who operates so successfully at times on English and continental railways.

When Spohr reached Gottingen he found his trunk gone, and from that day to this there has been no trace of the famous violin. But good records have been kept of its peculiar design and markings, and when it came before Mr. Blumenberg's eye he identified it.

When full proof of the instrument's identity, which Mr. Blumenberg is now seeking in Germany, is secured, it will be worth at least $15,000 to $20,000.

Joaquin Miller was once overtaken by a countryman who gave him a long ride. Tired, at length, of the conversation, the poet took a novel from his pocket. "What are you reading?" said the countryman. "A novel of Bret Harte's," said Mr. Miller. "Well, now, I don't see how an immortal being wants to be wasting his time with such stuff." "Are you quite sure," said the poet, "that I am an immortal being?" "Of course, you are." Owing to the Auburn fair, the taffy pulling was postponed till on the 15th. Everybody come and get sweet.

Mrs. H. B. Akins and Mrs. Frank Akins visited in Butler, Saturday.

The sale of Mrs. H. B. Akins amounted to $480.00.

The best part of Newville attended the Auburn fall festival.

Chas. Thomas is here from Iowa visiting friends.

SHODDY paint, like shoddy cloth, soon shows the wear; it looks nice to start with. Maybe that's the kind of paint you used on your house a year or so ago.

You'll not make the same mistake again, if you can help it; and you needn't if next time you use Devoe Lead-and-Zinc Paint.

It's an "all wool" paint; made to stay on a long time and look well while it's on; it's paint protection to property and pocketbook. Geo. W. Geddes, Agt.

"I'd Rather Die, Doctor than have my feet cut off," said M. L. Bingham, of Princeville, Ill., "but you'll die from gangrene (which had eaten away eight toes) if you don't," said all doctors. Instead he used Bucklen's Arnica Salve till wholly cured. Its cures of Eczema, Fever Sores, Boils, Burns and Piles astound the world. 25c at Stone's drug store. 39-1m Jacob Christoffel seems to be pretty well again. He is able to do some work and to go to town occasionally.

Mrs. Riser, formerly Miss Ethel Gaff, is said to be on the sick list.

Geo. Gunsenhouser anb wife returned last Saturday after a visit of one week, from Elkhart. It seems Mr. Gunsenhouser was out of health part of the time while away from home.

Supervisor Lyon is preparing to do a lot of work in the near future. It is getting late for road work, but perhaps it is better late than never.

Mrs. Eberly was able to attend the fair at Auburn last week, going one day visiting with relatives awhile and returning later. It was certainly an undertaking for one in her condition.

The town of Butler has done its share of grading on the Proctor road and now the road is in a better condition than ever before. For long years this road has been entirely neglected which was a disgrace to town and country. Culverts have been put in and the land along this road might some day be wanted for an addittion to the city.

John Barber, of near Adrian, Mich., was here last week on business relating to his father's estate. He and his brother, Jerry, were at Auburn Wednesday and took in the exhibits at the fair, reporting the attendance and things on exhibition good.

Many would like to attend the farmers' institute at Auburn, Wednesday, but owing to the cold weather it is likely but few will go from this part of the county.

How many, a year later will remember that snow fell here on the 12th of Oct., 1909. The cold wave is very severe on the people and no doubt will hastan preparations for winter.

For the purpose of feeding hogs and other stock some corn has been husked. The quality of much of the corn is good in many fields, but in some fields it is very poor.

This terrible calamity often happens because a careless boatman ignores the liver's warnings, growing ripples and aster current. Nature's warnings are kind. That dull pain or ache in the back warns you the Kidneys need attention if you would escape fatal maladies—Dropsy, Diabetes or Bright's disease. Take Electric Bitters at once and see Backache fly and all your best feelings return. "After long suffering from weak kidneys and lame back, one $1.00 bottle wholly cured me," writes J. R. Words to Freeze the Soul

"Your son has Consumption. His case is hopeless." These appalling words were spoken to Geo. E. Blevens, a leading merchant of Springfield, N. C., by two expert doctors—one a lung specialist. Then was shown the wonderful power of Dr. King's New Discovery. "After three weeks use," writes Mr. Blevens, "he was as well as ever. I would not take all the money in the world for what it did for my boy." Infallible for Coughs and Colds, its the safest, surest cure of desperate Lung diseases on earth. 50c and $1 00 at Stone's drug store. Guarantee satisfaction. Trial bottle free. 39-1m

We wish more of our readers were widows. They seem to be about the surest pay there is. They wish to keep their credit good, and so they pay their bills.

Hoarseness in a child subject to croup is a sure indication of the approach of the disease. If Chamberlain's Cough Remedy is given at once or even after the croupy cough has appeared, it will prevent the attack. Contains no poison. Sold by Geo. W. Geddes. 39-1m

Having fixdd the tariff schedules as the special interests wart them, Mr. Aldrich now proposes a new financial scheme, involving a great central bank, whereby such persons as Morgan and Rockefeller, with their steel trusts and Staneard Oil monopolies, can control the money of the country even more absolutely than they do now. And Mr. Taft is going up and down the country giving Aldrich a certificate of good character in order that his power in the senate may be greater than ever. Mr. Taft, it may be added, is doing all this at the public's expense. A fine spectacle, indeed.

It is in time of sudden mishap or accident that Chamberlain's Liniment can be relied upon to take the place of the family doctor, who cannot always be found at the moment. Then it is that Chamberlain's Liniment is never found wanting. In cases of sprains, cuts, wounds and bruises Chamberlain's Liniment takes out the soreness and drives away the pain. Sold by Geo. W. Geddes. 39-1m

The circulation hobby by newspaper men is beginning to die out. Advertisers are beginning to realize that it is not altogether circulation that makes advertising pay. It is getting what people that do take the paper to read the advertising, hence it is a matter of attractiveness now and not so much circulation.

Your cough annoys you. Keep on hacking and tearing the delicate membranes of your throat if you want to be annoyed. But if you want relief, want to be cured, take Chamberlain's Cough Remedy. Sold by Geo. W. Geddes. 39-1m

Messrs. Ridgill and Burns

Thousands of people have stomach trouble, constipation, indigestion, sick headache, etc., and don't know what to do for it. Perhaps the experience of Mr. Ridgill, postmaster at Bruceville, Tex., and Mr. Burns, Wabash R. R. engineer, Bement Ill., will suggest a method. Both of these men take pleasure in saying that they cured themselves with Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin. It is absolutely guaranteed to do what is claimed, and if you want to try it before buying, send your address for a free bottle to Pepsin Syrup Co., 119 Caldwell Bldg., Monticello, Ill. It is sold by all druggists at 50c and $1 a bottle. 39-1m

The Clover Leaf railroad has begun the use of modern motor cars that is, cars propelled by gasoline engines and dynamos. The first service of this kind on that road will be between Marion and Frankfort, where cars are running on a regular schedule. It is a wonderful stride and it is expected that this mode of power will revolutionize railroading in the next few years. With the establishing of the gasoline trains the Clover Leaf will have six daily trains between Marion and Frankfort, thus doubling their service. In addition they will have a train each way daily between Kokomo and Marion and in all probability more trains will be added in the near future.

Can't Learn in School

When the stomach is out of order or the bowels constipated, a feeling of drowsiness and inactivity comes over the body. The brain won't think, and the body won't work. If it is a child who suffers in this way, it naturally can't learn well in school, as it has no inclination for study. Give the child a dose of Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin and you will soon find it wonderfully improved and ultimately cured. It is guaranteed to do what is claimed, and if you want to try it before buying, send your address for a free sample bottle to Pepsin Syrup Co., 119 Caldwell Bldg., Monticello, Ill. It is sold by all druggists at 50c and $1 a bottle. 39-1m

Dr. Shumaker, representing the Butler Telephone Co., was present and said that the company was ready to co-operate with the council in any way to beautify the city and that he would meet with them again in four weeks to take up the matter of removing the poles and expense thereof.

The city engineer reported that the lateral sewers were completed by the Newman Sewer Co., and by motion said sewers were accepted.

The council then selected the following members of the different election boards:

Precinct No. 1—John Young, inspector; Stephen VanDusen and John H. Baxter, judges; Ed Showalter and S. H. Tyson, clerks; A. H. Fullmer and Adam Oberlin.

Precinct No. 2—D. A. Shaw, inspector; D. D. Diehl and Wm. Mutzfeld, judges; Isaac Hanna and Jay Pessell, clerks; John Horner and Henry W. Krontz, sheriffs.

Precinct No. 3—Charles Culbertson, inspector; Jasper Ocker and Charles Wagoner, judges; J. D. Mitchell and Fred Briggs, clerks; Gabriel Miller and Adolph May, sheriffs.

L. H. Higley and Dr. W. F. Shumaker were appointed election commissioners and A. H. Fullmer was employed to put up the election booths.

The superintendent made a requisition for some supplies and they were ordered bought.

The marshal was directed to lower the catch basin at the west end of Main street.

Moved and seconded that we adjourn to Monday evening, Oct. 25, 1909. Motion carried.

KNIGHTS OF PYTHIAS DEDICATE NEW HALL

Many Visitors Present---Butler Lodge Congratulated By Grand Lodge Officers

Butler Lodge No. 158, Knights of Pythias dedicated their new $4,500 Castle hall on last Thursday, being assisted by grand lodge officers, Dunten, Hart and Adams.

The following local members acted as grand lodge officers: Dr. Berkey, V. C.; Luther Knisely, Prel.; Robin Davis, K. of R. and S.; Frank Long, M. at A.; C. W. Beard, I. G.; J. D. Mitchell, O. G.; Chas. Madden, M of W.

The exercises consisted of the usual ritualistic ceremonies, toasts, short talks by the older members, music by the Mrs. Stage orchestra and singing by the K. of P. mail quartett, while the hall was decorated with the K. of P. colors, stars and stripes and potted plants and presented a grand appearance. The spirit of the day was taken up by the business houses of the city, which are largely represented in the order, and every business house in town was decorated with the Pythian colors while a large banner of "Welcome" reached from one side of Broadway to the other. Many visiting brothers of the order were present and conferred many compliments upon the members of the order, and the expression which adorned the faces of the latter was sufficient evidence of the fact that they felt proud to be called a member of Butler Lodge 158, one of the strongest societies in northern Indiana.

After the dedication services were over the rank of page was conferred upon the following candidates: Walter Mondhank, Lawrence Sewell, R. E. Preston, Gilbert Troyer, L. H. McInterf, Chas. Jennings, Geo. E. Blaker, Frank Gunsenhouser, J. M. Brown, V. F. Haywood, C. E. Dempsey, Henry Benner, S. G. Moore and M. J. Harrigan. The lodge was then closed until after the entertainment at the opera house which was free to the public, and consisted of music by the Mrs. Stage orchestra and impersonations and character sketches by Gilbert A. Eldridge. The house was packed as never before, and the entertainment perfect. This being over a large number of the members, together with the visitors, again returned to Castle hall and conferred the rank of esquire upon Messrs. Benner and Sewell, after which light refreshments were served.

Butler Lodge No. 158, received their charter from the grand lodge, permitting them to organize June 7, 1887, and the order was instituted with the following officers and charter members:

T. J. Knisely, P. C.; L. C. Hunt, C. C.; J. D. Kenestrick, V. C.; C. M. Evertts, Prel.; G. C. McMillen, M. of F.; F. W. Kinney, M. of F.; M. L. Wilkinson, K. of R. and S.; G. W. Geddes, M. at A.; Frank Stewart, I. G.; J. P. Blake, O. G. Other members were Edward Briggs, E. A. Loughsham, W. H. Stout, Joe Dunmaire, R. M. Lepset, W. H. Bard, A. Ackerman, Chas. Brice, Ed Snyder, W. H. Weber, W. D. Miller and S. C. McConkey.

The order flourished for some time until the railroad shops were moved and then came a hard fight to keep up the membership as a large portion of them were railroad men. But the present standing of the order, the beautiful home which they occupy and which is free from all indebtedness, tells the story of pluck, patients and perseverance.

Gilbert A. Eldridge who entertained the people at the opera house with his impersonations, pleased the people generally, and the house was packed as never before.

James Jennings of Edgerton assisted in dedicating the hall by being present

Ed Powers, the monument dealer of Angola attended the dedication, and pronounced the hall a fine one.

Our local K. of P. poet, J. D. Mitchel, came last on the program, and his poem brought the applause from every member of the order.

Lee Noragon, the acting chancellor commander, acquited himself finely, as did Frank Long and Robin Davis.

C. P. Uhrle, of Sturgis, Mich., was in Butler last Thursday to participate in the dedicating of the new K. of P. hall. He is, of course growing older but his looks doesn't show it.

Mr. Lennon acted as grand master-at-arms, and he gave his part in a creditable manner.

E. B. Dunten acted as toast master, and his ready flow of wit put life into the meeting.

J. D. Mitchell's poem will be published in our next issue. Be sure you read it.

Mel Everetts reports that fishing is at its best. He succeeded in landing a ten pound pickerel a short time ago, and has the head on exhibition. Fishing stories are very common with Mel, but he says the fish head verifies his statements.

Mrs. J. I. Best and Mrs. L A. Best, of Minneapolis, Minn., Mrs. S. W. Chubb, of Edon, Ohio, J. D. Craun and family, Mrs. Lee Rinehart, and Mrs. M. J. Best were entertained at dinner Friday at the home of George Bechtel and wife.

The HERALD office has been rushed with orders for printing from our enterprising business men for the past thirteen weeks. In fact the end has not been in sight since the new management began. There's a reason—work that's right, prices that's consistent. It's the HERALD, remember.

Miss Iva Haverstock was pleasantly surprised at her home on West Oak street Monday evening. Twenty-five of her friends had gathered to help participate in her birthday anniversary, and all enjoyed a pleasant evening. The favors were carnations. Miss Iva Harrigan, of Marion was an out of town guest. Miss Haverstock was presented with a beautiful cut glass water set.

The Rev. Dr. Albertson of the M. E. church has very kindly extended an invitation to the Knights of Pythias and Pythian Sisters of this city to attend services at the Methodist church on next Sunday evening at 7:00 o'clock. Dr. Albertson is a member of long standing in the order, a fluent speaker and a firm believer in the principals of Pythianism. He should be greeted with a large audience. The members are requested to meet at Castle hall at 6:30 and attend in a body.

Scientists say the north pole doesn't remain at the same place, but wobbles within a radius of thirty feet. Perhaps this accounts for the fact that it has staggered so many explorers.

It is expected that the next census will show a population of about 100,000,000 for the United States. The man who produces an article on which he can make 10 cents profit and which everybody needs knows what a population of 100,000,000 means.

The Halley comet, after being invisible for seventy-four years, has been sighted by a Heidelberg professor, but people who do not possess telescopes will not be able to see it until next spring. It is sad to think of the many famous ones who will have been forgotten before the plain people get a look at the comet.

The first anniversary of the granting of a constitution was observed as a holiday in Turkey on July 23, and in Constantinople the Sultan reviewed fifteen thousand troops before the Hill of Liberty. The anniversary, coming exactly a century and a third after the notable July day of America, may mean as much in Turkish history.

A board of army officers appointed to investigate charges of hazing at West Point, has found that the practice still exists there, in spite of all that Congress and the War Department have done to end it. The investigating board has been asked to make recommendations for the punishment of the cadets found guilty. Nothing but the severest penalties will stamp out the evil.

In order to facilitate the work of employes, the Belgian postal authorities have suggested that correspondents use red envelopes for all letters to Brussels, yellow envelopes for country letters, and green for those addressed to foreign countries. In a country so small territorially as Belgium such a plan has obvious advantages. To make it work in the United States, it would be necessary to call upon so many shades of color that a color-blind postoffice clerk would be driven to distraction in sorting the mail.

"Join a readin' club? Not if I know it! I ain't no woman of leisure with nothin' better to do than read books!" Thus spoke the harassed, uneducated wife and mother, whose children were daily forgetting at home what they learned at school. "The most dangerous woman in a community is a woman of leisure. She tries to divert herself by taking up one fad after another, and while she proclaims her usefulness, she is really undermining the foundations of social order and wise charity by her follies, which she calls benevolences." So a trained worker among the poor set forth her irritation with the superfluous helper, who, having no business of her own, occupied herself with that of other folk. Both critics illustrate the prevalent misconception of the meaning and use of leisure. The woman they describe is the idle woman. She is truly the enemy of society. Whether she reads libraries of cheap fiction, or plays daylong games of cards, or purveys gossip, or champions "reforms" as foolish as they are noisy, the idle woman is a burden and a menace. On the other hand, every woman who orders her life well and wisely is a true woman of leisure. Without some space in every day uncrowded with duties or pleasures, there is no flexibility of plan and no repose of spirit. Without leisure to furnish elasticity and to make possible some ripening thought, a woman's life becomes either a treadmill round or a wandering butterfly's flight. Leisure is the synonym for reserve power. Is fosters the sense of responsibility. It illumines dullness with humor. It restrains rashness and banishes pettiness. To be without leisure is to be without wisdom. Leisure sows the rare seed which idleness neglects, and even industry cannot gather the harvest which has not been sown.

Sometimes the newspapers announce in startling headlines that a lone highwayman has "held up" a train and gotten away with a fabulous amount of money. This fires the imagination of the criminally inclined and leads them to think that "easy money" may be had without work. But the fact is that very few criminals ever profit much by their ill-gotten gains. William A. Pinkerton, the veteran detective, declared, in a recent address, that no crime pays; that 95 per cent of criminals die in debt and frequently in want. And speaking of "hold-up" robbers especially, he says few are alive and out of prison to-day. The very limited number that are in comfortable circumstances are those who have abandoned criminal lines and taken to honest work. It sometimes happens that a man who has led a criminal life for a while reforms and after squaring himself with the law builds up a competence in some legitimate pursuit. This is partly due to the fact that a successful robber or burglar must be a man of more than ordinary nerve, ability and quickness. The same amount of energy and smartness and labor that he puts into his criminal enterprises would bring him a greater reward in some honest calling, with the added advantage of being able to keep and use what he makes. The ignorant, petty and clumsy thief usually has a short shrift. He is soon caught and put away. It is getting to be quite a general opinion among dectectives and students of criminology that men who attempt daring train robberies and similar crimes are men of unsound mind, probably dangerous lunatics, as no really sane man would take the desperate chances involved in such an attempt. If such is really the case, it is all the more important that what few bank or train robbers happen to be at large should be hunted down and put where they can no longer endanger the lives and property of the public.

Temperaments.

The physician of a former generation used to talk much of the "temperament" of his patients, that is to say, the predominant type of physical constitution possessed by each. He studied this permanent temperament fully as carefully as he did the disease temporarily present before deciding upon the line of treatment to be adopted.

Even to-day, although the physician speaks less of temperaments and diatheses, and perhaps would be at a loss to tell the names by which they were formerly designated, he by no means ignores the physical tendencies of his patients. From the viewpoint of temperament, one may regard the human family as divided into five great classes, although few belong solely to one type. Most persons have a mixture of two or more, being classified rather by the one which predominates.

The first of these temperaments is the lymphatic or phlegmatic. In this the individuals are of a quiet, rather inert disposition. They move slowly, but they move surely. They are usually dependable people, true to their word, and faithful to perform the duties assigned to them.

A second type, in many ways the direct opposite of the first, is the nervous temperament. These persons are quick in their movements, energetic in work and in play, strenuous, but often without staying power. What they acomplish they accomplish quickly.

The third type is the gouty, sanguine, or rheumatic. The individuals of this group are of florid complexion, frank and jovial disposition, good eaters and sleepers, and "never sick;" but in later life they pay for their previous health by gouty attacks, and when attacked by serious illness, they are likely to succumb quickly.

Persons of the bilious temperament are poor assimilators of food. They suffer from intestinal indigestion, which leads to repeated attacks of "biliousness;" all the processes of secretion and excretion are sluggishly performed.

The fifth temperament is the strumous. These people have poor digestion and defective reparative power, little cuts and scratches healing slowly; they are always "catching" whatever contagious disease is about; they lack firmness of texture; the glands in the neck, in the armpits and in the groins frequently become enlarged.

The treatment of the same disease in persons of different temperaments often varies greatly, and hence the importance of the study and power to recognize the five distinct temperaments.—Youth's Companion.

Expressive.

"Of all the quaint expressions I have heard recently," said the clubwoman "none has struck me as more delightful than that of an English woman who told me that her daughter 'would never smooth out a room.'"—New York Times.

Occasionally a man is so absentminded that he pays his gas bill the day before it is due.

PAPERS BY THE PEOPLE

TREATMENT, REAL AND IDEAL, OF ANIMALS.

By F. Howard Moore.

A large part of the energy of civilization has come out of the bodies of the great four-footed races. The horse, the ox, the mule, the elephant, the camel, the reindeer, the water buffalo, the yak, the dog, and the donkey—on the powerful and patient backs of these patient beings civilization has been borne for unknown hundreds of years.

Civilization is not an exclusively human thing. It is a joint product, the result of the combined labor and sacrifices of many races of mammals and birds. And no one of these races has the right to take more than its share of the blessings of civilization nor to shift upon others more than their portion of life's ills.

In the ideal state man treats the races of being affiliated with him not as objects of pillage, but as beings with rights and feelings and capabilities of happiness and misery like himself. He is kind to them and ever mindful of how he may gladden and enrich their necessarily meager lives.

He gets real pleasure by simply seeing them happy and realizing that he has in some measure contributed to that happiness. He provides them plenty to eat, comfortable homes, vacation days in which to rest, opportunities for pleasure and pastime, an education, and infirmaries for times of misfortune and decline.

QUESTION OF YOUR POSITION'S VALUE.

By John A. Howland.

I was talking with a bright young fellow the other day who has been nursing a little soreness against his employer. He went into the establishment as almost a beginner in the business. He has worked hard and faithfully for two years or more, with only one small increase in his salary. Six months ago, feeling that if he had progressed as he felt he had done, he was worth more money, he asked for more. But he hasn't got the "raise." He wasn't refused it; simply his employer hasn't given it to him.

That one greatest reason why this young man wouldn't think of leaving his employer was that in his work he felt he was getting a broad, liberal education in his specialty. That house which, through a friend there, had offered 50 per cent increase in salary, was slow, conservative, practically making no advance. In his present place of employment aggressive methods and unquestioned money to put them through had made it a standing example of up-to-date progress.

Men in business have built up organizations where they are besieged with applications for positions. Ordinarily that man who is an organizer in the true sense isn't searching out high priced, developed talent in other quarters with which to back up his business machinery. He is developing it himself. For this reason, in many lines of work, he has a double appreciation of the man who appreciates his organization for what that organization is. If he has a man drawing $10,000 salary who refuses to accept $20,000 a year in a third class establishment—and time and again such cases develop—should the organizer volunteer to increase the employe's salary because of the refusal? The man is tried and proved through the refusal of that offer; he has indicated to his employer that he means to stay where he is and do his whole duty according to office standards. But the organizer himself made the organization attractive. Shall he not have some of the benefits?

PLANE OF LIFE NOW INTERNATIONAL.

By Dr. Gustave Spiller.

We are living on an international plane. A large part of the population dwells in towns, and not only is travel to distant places rapid and frequent, but the movement of population from locality to locality and from country to country is a decided feature of the times. Through the utilization of steam and electricity villages and countries have been brought near to each other, the telegraphs for example, almost annihilating distance; hence the development of international commerce on an unprecedented scale, each place receiving the products of the farthest lands.

Simultaneously the democratic trend in politics became more and more noticeable. Accordingly to-day the total absence of constitutional government is a rarity, and not only have most men the vote, but women will soon have it, too. Even the orient, which was supposed to be unalterably absolutistic in government, has offered us recently the gratifying spectacle of one nation after another, Egypt, India, Japan, China, Persia, Turkey, demanding a constitution, and in many cases obtaining it.

Rapid transit and rapid news have, however, not only led to a close contact between the individuals of the several nations, but between the nations themselves. Hence village politics has gradually given way to national politics, and this to international politics, and men are consequently almost as sensitive to-day concerning what happens a thousand miles away as to what happens next door.

PROBLEMS OF BETTER HEALTH EDUCATION.

By Dr. Thomas Grant Allen.

It is obvious that in education health is fundamental, that you cannot properly educate a child that hasn't good health and that to maintain this health the conditions in the schoolroom must be physically wholesome. What is not so obvious is that it is the duty of the school to so train the child that he will keep in good health in after life about as easily and as naturally as he reads. The school that has failed to train the child to get good health and keep it has failed in educating the child as truly as if he were unable to read good literature with intelligence and appreciation. A sound body is, therefore, both a prerequisite for a good education and a test by which the quality of the education can be measured.

The health problems of the public schools have reference not only to the health of the school children and their ability to maintain their health in after life, but also in a larger sense to the health of the entire community. These problems are: to keep the schools free from contagious disease; to secure the correction or removal of physical defects; to provide the children with the proper living conditions; so to train them in wholesome habits of right living as to protect and develop their health, and to fortify them against disease.

THE HAMLET BY THE SEA.

There is a little seaport town,
Whence long ago a fleet of ships
Sped, white and gay, beyond where dips
The dim horizon down and down.

Old men sit on the pier and gaze,
With pipe in mouth and dull surmise,
And whisper 'thwart their blear-eyed haze:
"Say! don't you see the sails uprise?"

Mothers that maids were, also wait
To greet the vessels' glad return.
Yet vainly shall they watch and yearn;
No tide brings ships, or tells their fate.

Yet does the little port keep bright,
Having an atmosphere of pride
That such fair craft from it took flight,
The cliff-o'ertopping waves to ride.

My heart, you are the little place
Close by the sea; your hopes, the fleet
That sailed forth to your buoyant beat,
Homeward its course no more to trace.

Sometimes you fret, then grow content
To dream of those enchanted things,
Which to the gray, drear past have lent
The spotless splendor of their wings!
—Ainslee's.

What Marcy Did

"Marcy!" repeated Miss Alcock, a trifle petulantly. "Randolph Marcy! I never heard one man speak so frequently of another as you do of Randolph Marcy! And I never laid eyes on him! I don't believe he actually exists!"

MacNish laughed. "Indeed he does!" he asserted. "He's my best friend—has been for years!"

"Then why have I never met him?" demanded Miss Alcock, severely. "Why haven't you ever brought him around? I've known you for perfect ages!"

There was indignation in her brown eyes, the righteous indignation of a girl who feels she has been deliberately cheated.

As MacNish looked at her blankly, trying to reason out just why she had never met Marcy, he was conscious of an odd, new feeling. His swift and amazed analysis of it disclosed that the reason she hadn't met Marcy was that he didn't want her to meet Marcy!

It wasn't that MacNish was in love with Daisy Alcock—far, far from it! MacNish had other plans and matrimony was not included among them. He was making a career and he could tell you all about how marriage hampered, distracted, impeded and mangled a career, for he had listened to others talk and had added a few deductions himself.

Some time in the distant future when he had reached the stage where bellboys flew agilely at his appearances and portly bankers doffed their hats hastily at sight of him, he might sensibly, carefully, sanely choose a wife and establish a home. He looked with pitying scorn upon his friends who surrendered to a mere temporary madness and attached a ball and chain to an ankle so early in life. This, however, did not prevent him from seeking the society of attractive girls as did other men. The only difference, MacNish told himself, was that he kept his head and regarded them with mere philosophic liking.

It was a great relief not to be eternally falling in and out of love. The reason he had sought the society of Daisy Alcock so much and so long was that in spite of her prettiness she seemed to have common sense and to be willing to take the calm friendship he offered and not expect it to develop into sentimentality as many girls, he was annoyed to say, did. He liked her and he felt that she liked him and that was all there was to it.

Therefore he could not understand why he should have had a twinge of rebellion at the idea of Randolph Marcy, who was remarkably fascinating to girls with his gay laugh and graceful devotedness, as an acquaintance of Daisy Alcock's. MacNish prided himself on being far beyond the foolish stage where he thought a man's good looks counted. All sensible people, he felt, realized the charm of a rough-hewn face and a jaw that threatened achievements. MacNish had that kind of face and jaw.

He told himself that he had no use for a young woman who judged a man by his profile and could not look below the surface. Yet, though unacknowledged, he dimly realized that, running neck and neck with Randolph Marcy, he did not count for much with the average girl. Thus far he had never cared. Not being a marrying man, why should he mourn over the fact that he was not a social favorite.

"Why—why, I don't know!" McNish found himself stammering to Miss Alcock's last question when she had repeated it with some acerbity. "I didn't know you were so anxious to meet Marcy!"

WHEN MACNISH CAME TO.

"I'm not!" said Miss Alcock, distinctly. Nothing irritates a girl so much as to be told an unpleasant truth. "I've lived happily thus far without meeting Mr. Marcy and no doubt the remainder of my life won't be wrecked if his acquaintanceship doesn't come my way! Only, knowing you so well—and so long—it seems queer, when he's such a friend of yours! Why, it's just as though you didn't want me to meet him!"

"Nothing of the sort!" declared MacNish, hastily. Nothing irritates a man so much as to be told an unpleasant truth.

"It is, too!" declared Miss Alcock. "You were just thinking of yourself and not a bit about my pleasure or amusement!"

MacNish sat up straight. It was a blow to be told that he was not all-sufficient for the moment, present, past or future. Also Daisy looked very stunning when she was angry. But he didn't enjoy her being angry. MacNish felt very much at sea.

"I thought you were different from most girls!" he told her. "I didn't realize that you were so intent on widening your circle of admirers!"

"You are perfectly horrid!" Miss Alcock flashed at him, with crimson cheeks. Then, to his unutterable horror, she burst into tears.

When MacNish came to he found himself seated beside Daisy Alcock with two arms, undeniably his, clasping her to him and a voice strikingly like his own begging her not to cry, interspersing his appeals with a string of words and phrases he had foolishly thought existed only in the love scenes of mushy novels.

Instead of fleeing instantly he remained rooted to the spot, wondering why he hadn't been there before. A world of glittering stars and sunshine and little blue flowers and trilling birds suddenly had sprung to life all around him. He regarded the man he had been ten minutes before with deep dislike and disgust.

"Darling," MacNish said toward the end of the evening, "we'll have Randolph Marcy for best man!"

"I don't care," said Daisy Alcock with beautiful indifference. "A lamp post would do just as well so long as I've got you!"—Chicago Daily News.

Odd Little Farms in Japan.

Land is so scarce in Japan and the people are so numerous that a farm rarely consists of more than an acre or two. These little farms are divided up into tiny fields. During the season of the year in which we made our journey one of these fields is filled with sprouting barley, light green in color; another field—perhaps the next—with vetch, a lavender-colored, clover-like fodder; a neighboring field with a dark green grass, from the seed of which a lamp oil is manufactured; another with the pale yellow flowers of the mustard, and scattered here and there fields filled with what looked like a variety of lily—some white, some red, some yellow, but all equally brilliant.

Then, to get the complete picture, you must imagine patches of flowering azaleas dotting the roadside; towering, round-topped camellia trees breaking the skyline with frequent splashes of bright green; usually in the shade of these trees houses with white plastered walls and red tiled roofs; about the more pretentious of these houses were white plastered walls, above which appeared a profusion of palms, roses and strange native flowers; and in the doorways of the garden walls kimono-clad Japanese girls, the kimonos as many and as gayly colored as the garden that framed them.—Outing.

Feat of Burglars.

Smiles of The Day

Cornered.

Pa—Edith, how often do you practice on the piano when I'm away?

Edith—Every day, pa.

Pa—How long did you practice yesterday?

Edith—Four hours.

Pa—And to-day?

Edith—About the same.

Pa—Well, I'm glad to hear you're so regular. The next time you practice, however, be sure to unlock the piano. I locked it last week, and I've been carrying the key in my pocket ever since. Here it is!—Judge's Library.

Oh, You Magician.

One Comfort.

Dick was a very clean little boy, and dirt disgusted him. One day he found a poor little starved kitten crouching in a ditch at the roadside and he brought the wet, muddy little waif home with him.

He took it to the hydrant and carefully rinsed off all the mud, but the shock was too great for the sick kitty and the breath of life departed.

Dick brought her to his mother, who exclaimed at the sight of the wet drooping kitten, "Why, Dick, what have you done?"

"She was all mud and I washed her," Dick replied. "Oh, Dick," his mother said, sorrowfully, "I'm afraid she's dead." Dick looked shocked and grieved for a moment, then his face lighted up with a gleam of comfort as he exclaimed:

"Well, she died clean, anyway."—The Delineator.

The Redemption of David Corson

CHAPTER VI.

Early the next morning the two adventurers took their departure. The jovial quack lavished his good-byes upon the landlord and the "riff-raff" who gathered to welcome the coming or speed the parting guest at the door of the country tavern. He drove a pair of beautiful, spirited horses, and had the satisfaction of knowing that he excited the envy of every beholder, as he took the ribbons in his hand, swung out his long whip and started.

If her husband's heart was swelling with pride, Pepeeta's was bursting with anxiety. An instinct which she did not understand had prevented her from telling the doctor of her interview with the Quaker. Long before the farmhouse came in sight she began to scan the landscape for the figure which had been so vividly impressed upon her mind.

The swift horses, well fed and well groomed, whirled the light wagon along the road at a rapid pace and as they passed the humble home of the Quaker, Pepeeta saw a little child driving the cows down the long lane, and a woman moving quietly among the flowers in the garden; but David himself was not to be seen.

A tear fell from her eye, and her chin quivered. With the utmost effort of her will she could not repress these evidences of her disappointment, and with a spasmodic motion she clutched the arm of the driver as if it were that of Destiny and she could hold it back. So sudden and so powerful was the grasp of her young hand, that it turned the horses out of the road and all but upset the carriage. With a violent jerk of the reins, the astonished driver pulled them back, and exclaimed with an oath:

"You little wild cat, if you ever d-d-do that again, I will throw you into the d-d-ditch!"

"Excuse me!" she answered humbly, cowering under his angry glances.

"What is the matter?" he asked, more kindly, seeing the tears in her eyes.

"I do not know. I am nervous, I guess," she answered, sadly.

"Nervous? P-p-peeta Aesculapius nervous? I thought her nerves were made of steel? What is the m-m-matter?" he asked, looking at her anxiously.

His gentleness calmed her, and she answered: "I am sorry to leave a place where I have been so happy! Oh! why cannot we settle down somewhere and stay? I get so tired of being always on the wing. Even the birds have nests to rest in for a little while. Are we never going to have a home?"

"Nonsense, child! What do we want with a h-h-home? It is better to be always on the go. I want my liberty. It suits me best to fly through the heavens like a hawk or swim the deep sea like a shark. A home would be a p-p-prison. I should tramp back and forth in it like a polar bear in a c-c-cage. B-b-be gay! Be happy! How can you be sad on a morning like this? Look at the play of the muscles under the smooth skins of the horses? Remember the b-b-bright shining dollars that we coaxed out of the tightly b-b-buttoned breeches pockets of the gray-backed Q-Q-Quakers. What more do you ask of life? What else can it g-give?"

"It does not make me happy! I shall never be happy until I have a home," she said, still sobbing, and trying to conceal the cause of her grief from herself as well as from her husband.

She had divined the cause of her disappointment with an unerring instinct. It was exactly as she thought. At the last instant, David's heart had failed him.

On the preceding evening, he had hurried through his "chores," excused himself from giving an account of the adventures of the day on the ground of fatigue, and retired to his room to cherish in his heart the memories of that beautiful face and the prospects of the future. He could not sleep. For hours he tossed on his bed or sat in the window looking out into the night, and when at last he fell into an uneasy slumber his dreams were haunted by two faces which struggled ceaselessly to crowd each other from his mind. One was the young and passionate countenance of the gypsy, and the other was that of his beautiful mother with her pale, carven features, her snow-white hair, her pensive and unearthly expression. They both looked at him, and then gazed at each other. Now one set below the horizon like a wan, white moon, and the other rose above it like the glowing star of love. Now the moon passed over the glowing star in a long eclipse and then disappearing behind a cloud left the brilliant star to shine alone.

When he awoke the gray dawn revealed in vague outline the realities of the world, and warned him that he had but a few moments to execute his plans. He sprang from his couch strong in his purpose to depart, for the fever of adventure was still burning in his veins, and the rapturous looks with which Pepeeta had received his promise to be her companion still made his pulses bound. He hurriedly put a few things into a bundle and stole out of the house.

As he moved quietly but swiftly away from the familiar scenes, his heart which had been beating so high from hope and excitement began to sink in his bosom. He had never dreamed of the force of his attachment to this dear place, and he turned his face toward the old gray house again and again. Every step away from it seemed more difficult than the last, and his feet became heavy as lead. But he pressed on, ashamed to acknowledge his inability to execute his purpose. He came to the last fence which lay between him and the bridge where he had agreed to await the adventurers, and then paused.

He was early. There was still time to reflect. Had the carriage arrived at that moment he would have gone; but it tarried, and the tide of love and regret bore back to the old familiar life. "I cannot go. I cannot give it up," he murmured to himself.

Torn by conflicting emotions, inclining to first one course and then another, he finally turned his face away from the bridge and fled, impelled by weakness rather than desire. He did not once look back, but ran at the top of his speed straight to the old barn and hid himself from sight. There, breathless and miserable, he watched. He had not long to wait. The dazzling "turn-out" dashed into view. On the high seat he beheld Pepeeta, saw the eager glance she cast at the farm house, followed her until they arrived at the bridge, beheld her disappointment, raved at his own weakness, rushed to the door, halted, returned, rushed back again, returned, threw himself upon the sweet smelling hay, cursed his weakness and indecision and finally surrendered himself to misery.

From the utter wretchedness of that bitter hour, he was roused by the ringing of the breakfast bell. Springing to his feet, he hastened to the spring, bathed his face, assumed a cheerful look and entered the house.

For the first time in his life he attempted the practice of deception, and experienced the bitterness of carrying a guilty secret in his bosom. How he worried through the morning meal and the prayer at the family altar, he never knew, and he escaped with inexpressible relief to the stable and the field to take up the duties of his daily life. He found it plodding work, for the old inspirations to endeavor had utterly vanished. He who had hitherto found toil a beatitude now moved behind the plow like a common drudge.

Tired of the pain which he endured, he tried again and again to forget the whole experience and to persuade himself that he was glad the adventure had ended; but he knew in his heart of hearts that he had failed to follow the gypsy, not because he did not really wish to, but because he did not wholly dare. The consciousness that he was not only a bad man but a coward, added a new element to the bitterness of the cup he was drinking.

Each succeeding day was a repetition of the first, and became a painful unrest. The very world in which he lived seemed to have undergone a transformation. The sunlight had lost its glory, the flowers had become pale and odorless, the songs of the birds dull and dispiriting.

Some men pass their lives in the midst of environments where insincerity would not have been so painful; but in a home and a community where sham and hypocrisy were almost unknown these perpetual deceptions became more and more intolerable with every passing hour. Nothing could be more certain than that in a short time, like some foreign substance in a healthy body, his nature would force him out of this uncongenial environment. With some natures the experience would have been a slow and protracted one, but with him the termination could not be long delayed.

It came in a tragedy at the close of the next Sabbath. The day had been dreary, painful and exasperating beyond all endurance, and he felt that he could never stand the strain of another. And so, having detained his mother in the sitting room after the rest of the family had retired, he paced the floor for a few moments, and after several unsuccessful attempts to introduce the subject gently, said bluntly:

"Mother, I am chafing myself to death against the limitations of this narrow life."

"My son," she said, calmly, "this has not come to me as a surprise."

He moved uneasily and looked as if he would ask her "Why?"

"Because," she said, as if he had really spoken, "a mother possesses the power of divination, and can discern the sorrows of her children, by a suffering in her own bosom."

The consciousness that he had caused her pain rendered him incapable of speech, and for a moment they sat in silence.

"What is thy wish and purpose, my son?" she asked at last, with an effort which seemed to exhaust her strength.

"I wish to see the world," he answered, his eye kindling as he spoke. "I have seen it in my dreams. I have heard its distant voices calling to me. My spirit chafes to answer their summons. I strain at my anchor like a great ship caught by the tide."

"Shall I tell thee what this world of which thee has dreamed such dreams is really like, my son? I will," she said, regarding him with a look which seemed to devour him with yearning love. "This world whose voices thee hears calling is a fiction of thine own brain. That which thee thinks thee beholds of glory and beauty thee hast conjured up from the depths of a youthful and disordered fancy, and projected into an unreal realm. That world which thee has thus beheld in thy dreams will burst like a pin-pricked bubble when thee tries to enter it. It is not the real world, my son. How shall I tell thee what that real world is? It is a snare, a pit-fall. It is a flame into which young moths are ever plunging. It promises, only to deceive; it beckons, only to betray; its smiles are ambushes; it is sunlight on the surface, but ice at the heart; it offers life, but it confers death. I bid thee fear it, shun it, hate it!"

"Mother," he exclaimed, "what does thee know of this world, thee who has passed thy life in lonely places and amongst a quiet people?"

She rose and paced the floor as if to permit some of her excitement to escape in physical activity, and pausing before him, said: "My only and well-beloved son, thee does not know thy mother. A veil has been drawn over that portion of her life which preceded thy birth, and its secrets are hidden in her own heart. She has prayed God that she might never have to bring them into the light; but he has imposed upon her the necessity of opening the grave in which they are buried, in order that, seeing them, thee may abandon thy desires to taste those pleasures which once lured thy mother along the flower-strewn pathway to her sin and sorrow."

Her solemnity and her suffering produced in the bosom of her son a nameless fear. He could not speak. He could only look and listen.

"Thee sees before thee," she continued, "the faded form and features of a woman once young and beautiful. Can thee believe it?"

He did not answer, for she had seemed to him as mothers always do to children, to have been always what he had found her upon awakening to consciousness. He could not remember when her hair was not gray. Something in her manner revealed to the startled soul of the young Quaker that he was about to come upon a discovery that would shake the very foundation of his life; for a moment he could not speak.

"David," she said, in a voice that sounded like an echo of a long-dead past, "the fear that the sins of thy parents should be visited upon thee has tormented every hour of my life. I have watched thee and prayed for thee as no one but a mother who has drunk the bitter cup to its dregs could ever do. I have trembled at every childish sin. In every little fault I have beheld a miniature of the vices of thy mother and thy father—thy father! Oh! David, my son—my son!"

The white lips parted, but no sound issued from them. She raised her white hand and clutched at her throat as if choking. Then she trembled, gasped, reeled, and fell forward into his arms.

In a moment more, the agitated heart had ceased to beat, and the secret of her life was hidden in its mysterious silence. The sudden, inexplicable and calamitous nature of this event came near unsettling the mental balance of the sensitive and highly organized youth. Coming as it did upon the very heels of the experiences which had so thoroughly shaken his faith in the old life, he felt himself to be the target for every arrow in the quiver of misfortune.

THE END.

Tragedy of a Young Woman Lonesome in the City.

"Loneliness drives her to Death," the newspaper headline proclaimed. Thousands of people read the item that evening, the tragedy of a woman's life told in three hundred words. She was a young woman—early in the thirties. She had been a school teacher in a small city, happy with work and study and friends, but finding it difficult to support herself upon her meager salary, had accepted a position as bookkeeper for a firm in a large city several hundred miles from her home.

The work was not difficult and the salary was ample, but she missed her old friends, and—the newspaper told the sequel a year later.

It was a pitiful case. Many conscientious people, reading of it, reproached themselves that such a thing could have been possible; but after all, were people to blame?

In that city were over three hundred churches, each with its own social organizations and opportunities. The stranger went to one on one of her first Sundays in the city. As it happened, it was a church noted throughout the country for its splendid Bible classes and happy church life. She was cordially welcomed and invited to join them, but she never went a second time. She told one of the few people to whom she spoke of her life that "somehow she wasn't interested."

There was in the city an active Young Women's Christian Association, with numerous classes and social events each week. She went down there one night and looked over the schedule; she found but one class she thought she would care to join, and that, upon investigation, proved too elementary. So she never went again.

An art school was her next experiment. She joined a class in design, but took only one lesson. "Nobody talks—there isn't a chance to get acquainted," she said; but when the teacher suggested other classes where the work allowed conversation, she refused to try them.

Just before her death she happened to say that she had not read a book for a year, yet the city had a fine public library with every facility for readers, several unusually good technical libraries, and a number of circulating libraries and reading-rooms. There was also a university, with evening courses for unclassified students and university extension lectures.

In the office where she worked were a dozen other girls and women—possibly some as lonely as she. She refused all their overtures. The Young Women's Christian Association, various settlements and numerous churches were making constant appeals for workers, and some of the appeals reached her, stranger though she was. She passed them all by. Night after night she sat alone in her room brooding over her loneliness, until at last it seemed to her that she could endure it no longer. So the end came—infinitely pathetic and tragic, but—whose was the blame?—Youth's Companion.

Not to Be Trapped.

"Concede nothing," was the advice of a well-known politician concerning a certain famous disputed election. His policy was followed to the letter by the man of whom the Chicago Tribune tells. On the relief train that had been rushed to the scene of the railway wreck was a newspaper reporter.

The first victim he saw was a man whose eyes were blackened and whose left arm was in a sling. With his hair full of dirt, one end of his shirt collar flying loose and his coat ripped up the back, the victim was sitting on the grass and serenely contemplating the landscape.

"How many people are hurt?" asked the reporter, hurrying up to him.

"I haven't heard of anybody being hurt, young man," said the other.

"How did this wreck happen?"

"I haven't heard of any wreck."

"You haven't? Who are you, anyhow?"

"I don't know that it's any of your business, but I'm the claim agent of the road."

A Talking Machine.

Brother—How did you like my friend, Mr. Smith.

Sister—Why, he yawned three times while I was talking to him.

Brother—Perhaps he wasn't yawning. He may have been trying to say something.

A Foregone Conclusion.

"Everybody thinks that Amelia is such a sweet girl, and I can't see it."

"You can't? Why, man, her father made a big fortune in the sugar business."

Ready for Trial.

"The charge is desertion. What'll be your defense?"

"Temporary insanity, or I never would have married her."

FOR AND ABOUT WOMEN

Suppress That Nervous Laugh.

A musical laugh is a rare gift; a hearty one is infectious; but if you are incapable of either, suppress a laugh that means nothing. The woman who really laughs is a joy to those around her. It may not possess a pitch that delights a musicianly ear; it may have infectious little notes that do not stand for harmony; but if it is real and joyous it will make all those who hear it smile.

The laugh that is annoying is the one without meaning. It is a nervous ripple that is often used as a period or an exclamation point. It is placed at the ending of every sentence, and takes from the spoken word any meaning or emphasis it might have. Many women who do it are not conscious of it. They are far from silly women. They have poise and sense, and are not as easily confused as one would judge by the futile laughter they give after their sentences. If this idea impresses you at all, watch your own style of talking when outside the family circle and intimate friends. You may not be given to laughter, but again you may find that you unconsciously punctuate your most commonplace sentences with a laugh that is as artificial as your back puffs.

If you do this, stop it. This noise, which is a giggle in girls, an inane laugh in women, is the result of pure thoughtlessness.

The remarkable sound, given to man alone, called laughter, should be used only to express mirth. When it is not spontaneous it is not laughter, and the men who write dictionaries should give it another name. Giggle is the only substitute so far, but it does not designate that insipid, mirthless sound that hundreds of women permit themselves.

Corset Does Not Pinch.

A corset that can be hooked without pinching the body and tearing the underwear to bits is that invented by an Illinois woman.

The advantage of this is derived from the fact that the hooks are located just to one side of the lacing and are prevented from injuring either flesh or clothing by a flap extending under them. In most corsets the steels and hooks extend down the center, and in pressing the hooks and eyes together it is no uncommon thing to pinch a ridge of flesh between them or tear a garment. With the stays shown in the illustration this annoyance is eliminated. They lace down the center and the hooking arrangement is to one side. Underneath the hooking device is a shield which presents a perfectly flat surface at all times to the body and no matter how hard it is to get the corset together, there is never any danger of squeezing or injuring the flesh or clothing in the operation.

Health and Beauty Hints.

The woman who exercises can more safely indulge in rich foods, fat meats, sweets and pastry than she who leads a sedentary life.

Forcing food is one of the surest roads to dyspepsia. Except when not in normal health the average person should skip a meal occasionally when not hungry.

Eyes which have become inflamed from exposure to the sun can have the bloodshot condition quickly reduced by bathing them for five minutes in water as hot as is comfortable.

Biliousness should be fought in the first stages. Try regulating diet. Take glass of hot water half-hour before each meal and at bedtime. In either morning or evening glass squeeze juice of half a lemon.

Do not neglect the value of fruit in improving the complexion. Nothing equals the juice of oranges and lemons to clear up the skin and brighten eyes. The latter must be diluted and taken without sugar, a half lemon in a glass of water.

Perfect cleanliness of the teeth is most essential and can be secured by a thorough brushing in the morning and after each meal and using an antiseptic lotion. Dental floss should be drawn between the teeth after each meal and before retiring.

You must not stop laughing, or you will be like the woman who at an advanced age had not a line or wrinkle in her face, but whose countenance was entirely expressionless. Dreading these same lines and wrinkles, she had all her life schooled her features to express neither joy nor sorrow.

A Quick Lunch.

Lunch at a railroad station means, for some people, two pieces of half-raw dough, called bread; a sample of butter hidden beside a small scrap of partially copked ham that won't stay inside of the sandwich and won't come out. And the description is not complete without the admission that it is "grabbed" and "bolted" while the clock hand jumps from minute to minute. It doesn't sound nice, and the description ought to be enough to insure a well developed case of indigestion.

Good Work of Women.

The mayor and councilmen of Des Moines have asked the Civic Committee of the women's clubs of that city to present to them their plan for a city beautiful, and it is possible that the first step will be the engaging of a civic expert, who will consult with the city authorities and the ladies, and a plan be formed.

Lack of Reverence for Women.

Mr. Edwin Markham's observation that the chief social shortcoming of the United States may be our increasing lack of reverence for women will not meet with general acceptance. But it deserves consideration. It is perfectly possible that women may have the largest rights where they have the smallest reverence. And if this reverence of men for women be really lacking, it is certain that the respect of women for men will fail also. And when the relation between men and women shall be thus degraded, nothing can save the whole fabric of life from a process of swift deterioration. —Chicago Examiner.

THREE LATE STYLES.

Rose Beaver Hat with a Scarf of Satin and Marabout, a Scarf and Muff of Gray Chiffon and Ermine, and a Hat and Muff of Pleated Rose Silk and Fur.

Fads and Fancies in Dress

The cuirass has suddenly become a fitted garment of silk elastic, smooth as a glove from neck to wrist and hip line.

The newest sleeveless coat is cut out generously under the arms and the sides are held together by cords instead of bands and straps.

The fichu of Marie Antoinette folds round the shoulder, forms a sleeve, crosses in front and ties at the back, concealing much of the figure.

The outline of the Watteau plait grows almost a familiar sight. It is belted in or allowed to fall loosely, according to the gown and the occasion.

Some charming old-world frocks are carried out in soft taffetas, shot with three or four pale colorings, such, for instance, as mauve, pink and periwinkle blue.

Leather hats promise to be particularly popular with the traveler. They are to be had in patent leather as well as suede, and in a wide range of shapes and colors.

The modified kimono, which is the old wrapper with a Japanese touch in the sleeve and banded edge around the neck and downward, remains a favorite for bed-room wear.

The center parting of the hair with the wide Racamier chignon and wide puffs at the sides comports well with the big millinery of the day. Women with small, delicate features find it especially becoming.

Sashes worn with the cuirass gown of the moyen age are fastened so that their flat folds lie close upon the lower edge of the cuirass, while the bow, tied to the right of the center back, falls among the lower plaits of the skirt.

Importance of Teeth.

Dr. Osler has stated that the question of preserving the teeth is more important than the liquor question. No doubt much dyspepsia is due to decayed and defective teeth, which preclude complete mastication of the food (even if anybody in America had the time to eat properly). Dentists, like doctors, are now beginning to realize that their true mission is not "a general rebuilding system," but a systematic and well-considered effort to prevent and overcome the decay and loosening or human teeth.

Keeping Table Linen.

In keeping the table linen that is not in daily use many a housekeeper is annoyed to find that it has yellowed badly and must be washed again before it can go on the table again.

This can be overcome if, after being laundered, the cloths and napkins are carefully wrapped in deep blue paper or in a sheet that has been heavily blued.

Mending with Machine.

Table linen and tears in clothing can be darned better and in one-tenth the time it takes to do it by hand. It needs a double-thread machine, as it cannot be done on a chain-stitch machine. Use fine thread, about 100 or 120 for table linen. Remove the foot of the machine, or leave it up if it lifts high enough so that you can see where to stitch. Put the part of the article to be mended in an embroidery hoop, place under needle and stitch back and forth, toward and from you, till it is filled with thread one way. Then turn and sew across the threads till entirely filled. Do not turn the work at end of each row of stitching, but draw it back and forth, running machine as fast as you wish. In case of a jagged tear, draw edges together with basting thread before inserting in hoop.

Women Take Men's Jobs.

Of the 4,833,630 women workers in the United States, according to the latest census returns, 44.2 per cent—nearly half—are under 25 years of age, while 21 per cent have not reached the age of 21. Of the 303 occupations in which bread winners of the country are engaged, women have pre-empted a place in all but nine, says the Van Norden Magazine. In the list of unusual pursuits adopted five were pilots, ten were baggagewomen on steam railroads, thirty-one brakewomen and twenty-six switchwomen, yardwomen, and flagwomen, forty-three were carriage and hack drivers, and 508 machinists.

A man who wanted a new house built might have all the work done by women, for the report shows that besides the 100 architects, who come more properly under the "professions," there are 150 women builders and contractors in the United States, 167 women masons, 545 women carpenters, 45 women plasterers, 1,759 women painters, glaziers and varnishers, 126 women plumbers, 241 women paperhangers, and two women slaters and roofers. It is not unusual in the middle west and Pacific coast states to meet with the actual performance of these mechanical lines of work by women.

Hat for Traveling.

If a woman is going away only for a few days, so that her baggage is limited, it is decreed that she may wear a large hat on the train. But the medium sized or small hats are the best for the occasion. The large hats are hard to pack, and this is the reason so many of them are worn on the train, the smaller ones being packed away. A chick little French hat, admirably suited for traveling. It is burnt straw, trimmed with band and bow of black velvet, put on as indicated in sketch. Three deep-purple roses nestle close to edge of narrow brim on left side.

TRAVELING HAT.

Moonlight Sore Eyes.

Moonlight is so intense at times in Cuba that it causes sore eyes, and the natives go about with umbrellas and paralunas. This affection is cured, according to Frank Steinhart, former consul general to Cuba, by washing the eyes with moonlight-fallen dew. These dews have been found to have radioactive and electric properties.

Cutting Soap.

Soap improves with keeping, so it always should be brought in large quantities. Before storing it, however, it is well to cut the bars into convenient pieces, for this is most easily done when it is soft. The cutting may be done with a piece of string or wire more easily than with a knife.

Gloves with Circles.

The smart glove that many fashionable women are wearing has the back heavily embroidered with circles in colored silk. This is in the color, if not tone, as the kid of the glove

Great Crops in Western Canada

Canadian Correspondence:

During the early days in the growth of the crop in Western Canada, as well as throughout the ripening and garnering period, there is yearly growing an increasing interest throughout the United States, as to the probable results when harvest is completed. These mean much to the thousands of Americans who have made their home in some one of the three Provinces that form that vast agricultural domain, and is of considerable interest to the friends they have left behind them.

The year 1909 is no disappointment; it will bring comfort and happiness, wealth and luxury to those who are following agriculture as a pursuit in the country now occupying so much of the attention of the world—of this continent in particular. Reports from the grain fields warrant the note of optimism that has been so prominent during the past few months. The crops of wheat, oats and barley have been harvested and it is now safe to speak of results. Throughout the entire grain-growing area of 320,000 square miles there has been a uniform production and a high average. Careful estimates place the yield of spring wheat at 30 bushels per acre, winter wheat at over 40 bushels and oats exceed 50 bushels per acre. Barley also has proved an abundant yield. What will attract the reading public more than volumes of figures will be the fact that those who have been induced through the influence of the Government to accept of 160 acres of free grant land, or, by the persuasion of friends to leave their home State of Dakota, Minnesota, Iowa, Illinois, Michigan, Indiana, Ohio, Nebraska or the other States from which people have gone, have done well. Financially, they are in a better position than many of them ever expected to be, and in the matter of health, in social conditions, they have lost nothing.

The columns of Canadian newspapers are filled with accounts of this year's harvest, writers vying with each other in giving the proper coloring to their reports. These make exhilarating reading to the man who has interests in that country. Lethbridge people claim it to be the keystone of Southern Alberta, while Calgary people claim the same for their district. It was in this district that the growing of winter wheat in western Canada originated. Its success there led the farmers east and west of it to experiment and what can now be said of one part may well be said of the whole. In a few years from now these great plains over whose breadth for years roved hundreds of thousands of heads of cattle, following the millions of buffalo that once grazed their grasses, will be a solid grain field covering a territory of over 30,000 square miles, and very little of it but what will yet be worth from $40 to $60 per acre. Already the homestead and pre-emption lands are being well filled.

In the district of Calgary and in Central Alberta, since the report of a year ago was made, the increased acreage in crop has been remarkable. The newly-arrived settler has got to work and with the steam-plow and ordinary methods of farming a large amount of new land is contributing to the wealth of the country. Railroads have projected and built branches which reach out laterally from the main line, and it is now possible to reach parts rich in agricultural possibilities that were not accessible a year ago. Towns have come into existence during that time that will soon become cities; schools and churches have been erected throughout the country districts; telephone lines have been constructed, and an air of prosperity is everywhere apparent. There are to be found those who speak of a "pioneering" life in western Canada, but as one man said, "If this is pioneering I don't for the life of me see what our forefathers had to complain of." He didn't know, though, for the pioneering of his forefathers was discomfort and hardship. The opening up and development of western Canada, with its railroad lines to carry one to almost the uttermost part of it, the telegraph line to flash the news to the other outside world, the telephone to talk to one's neighbor, the daily and weekly mail service which brings and carries letters to the friends in distant parts; the schools headed by college-bred and highly-certificated teachers; the churches manned by brilliant divines; the clubs; the social and festive life; what is there about any of this to give to the man who goes there to make his home the credit of being a pioneer? Nothing! He might as well be in any of the old middle west states.

A few years ago when this country was not as well known as to-day there was some justification in long-winded attempts to educate the reader on conditions there, to tell him of its geographical relation with the United States, but with about 400,000 Americans now there writing back to their friends, with the mass of literature that has been placed in the homes of farmers in every State of the Union and the thousands of columns descriptive of the country that have appeared in newspapers and magazines, it would seem a reflection on the intelligence of the reading public to repeat it. It is not proposed to do so. Its topographical characteristics are divergent. There is the level prairie with its rich deep loam and underlying subsoil, the higher and rolling lands with their groves of timber, the wooded lands rich in soil. The wants of all can be supplied; some want one kind and some another and they can all be suited. The man who wants to put in his steam plow and force the energies of the soil into immediate production can be suited, and so can the man who wishes large tracts for the same purposes, and at the same time enjoy the companionship of the timber. In many parts it is possible to have a hundred mile square of wheat, without a break. A writer says: "We were driven west and north of Moose Jaw through 20 miles of dead ripe wheat, acres of stooks and well-worked summer-fallows. One of these fields would yield 40 bushels to the acre, and another man had oats that would yield 90 or 100 bushels to the acre. In this district wheat will average 30 to 35 bushels. The conditions were never better and throughout the district the people are assured of a most prosperous year." In the Melfort district, three hundred miles in another direction, we hear of a farmer whose yield of oats will run from 85 to 100 bushels per acre; then traveling over another stretch of three hundred miles the Pipestone district in Manitoba is reached and we learn of more 30 and 40 bushels to the acre crops of wheat. So it will be seen that the splendid crops are not confined to one district, but are general throughout the entire country.

Speaking of his experiences while traveling through the Canadian West, Thomas C. Shotwell, financial Editor of the New York American, said that heretofore he had entertained optimistic views regarding the Canadian railroads and lands, but his trip has convinced him, not only of the soundness of his views, but it also has established the conviction that the great expansion of the next few years will be in Canada's western areas. "I have never seen such wheat," said he.

It takes an army of men to handle the Western Canada crop, and it is estimated that 30,000 people have been brought in this year to assist in the great undertaking; there being excursions from the outside world nearly every day for the past six weeks.

In this article no attention has been given to the growth of flax which has had great attention paid to it in some districts. It is safe to say that in addition to the 120 million bushels of wheat, the 170 million bushels of oats and the 30 million bushels of barley, there will be over two million bushels of flax. The approximate value of all these crops may safely be put at One Hundred and Sixty Million Dollars, as against a total of 118 million dollars in 1908.

Falling Hair

Ayer's Hair Vigor promptly destroys the germs that cause falling hair. It nourishes the hair-bulbs, restores them to health. The hair stops falling out, grows more rapidly.

Dandruff.

Ayer's Hair Vigor just as promptly destroys the germs that cause dandruff. It removes every trace of dandruff itself, and keeps the scalp clean and in a healthy condition.

Does not Color the Hair

We wish you to positively and distinctly understand that Ayer's Hair Vigor does not affect the color of the hair, even to the slightest degree. Persons with the whitest or the lightest and most delicate blond hair may use it freely without having the hair made a shade darker.

Ingredients: Sulphur. Glycerin. Quinin. Sodium Chlorid. Capsicum. Sage. Alcohol. Water. Perfume.

Cotton Holds Wrinkles —Wool Holds Style

You don't care what your clothes are made of—all you want is the result.

If somebody could invent a way to make more lasting and more stylish clothes out of part cotton than out of pure wool, you would prefer the cotton.

Clothcraft All-Wool Clothes

But the facts, as you know, are that part cotton clothes hold wrinkles and keep shabby while clothes of pure wool hold style and keep shapely.

Clothcraft Clothes are pure wool —there's a Signed Guarantee in each suit. And they sell at the same prices as part-cotton clothes.

They are the ONLY clothes at these prices that are Guaranteed pure wool.

As soon as enough people find out about these clothes, we won't be able to get enough from the factory to supply the demand.

Eat What You want of the food you need Kodol will digest it

You need a sufficient amount of good wholesome food and more than this you need to fully digest it.

Else you can't gain strength, nor can you strengthen your stomach if it is weak.

You must eat in order to live and maintain strength.

You must not diet, because the body requires that you eat a sufficient amount of food regularly.

But this food must be digested, and it must be digested thoroughly.

When the stomach can't do it, you must take something that will help the stomach.

The proper way to do is to eat what you want, and let Kodol digest the food.

Nothing else can do this. When the stomach is weak it needs help; you must help it by giving it rest, and Kodol will do that.

Our Guarantee

Go to your druggist today, and purchase a dollar bottle, and if you can honestly say, that you did not receive any benefits from it, after using the entire bottle, the druggist will refund your money to you without question or delay.

We will pay the druggist the price of the bottle purchased by you.

This offer applies to the large bottle only and to but one in a family.

We could not afford to make such an offer, unless we positively knew what Kodol will do for you.

It would bankrupt us.

The dollar bottle contains 2½ times as much as the fifty cent bottle.

Wages $1.50--Wheat $1.15

"The Wabash railroad is in search of laborers to do section work along the line, and has been for the past few weeks. The company has found it almost impossible to hire enough men in the towns touched by the road to make the needed repairs along the company's right-of way, and foreigners are being brought from St. Louis and other large cities. Only a short time ago the wages of the section men were raised from $1.35 to $1.50 a day, but even this seems little inducement." The above quotation is taken from the Fort Wayne News, as well as the prices in the heading. We should think the Wabash rairroad company would want laborers. In the name of common sense, how can a man support a family for the wages given in the article? We give the price that the consumer has to pay for some of the necessities which are also taken from the Fort Wayne News: Eggs, 26c per bozen; country butter, 32c per lb; lard, 15c per lb; apples, 40c per peck, with all other table provisions equally as high in proportion. Added to this is the increase in rent, fuel and many other things which the laboring man must buy. If there is any more arduous employment than that of working on the section, we hope to be fortunate enough to escape it, and for this the men are to receive $1.35 and $1.50 per day. Therer has been about thirteen years of republican government, and if wages are to be "raised," isn't it about time?

Eight girls over at Butler, Ind., declare that they will never get married. The youngest is said to be thirty eight years old and the oldest one about sixty. As soon as they get over their second childhood they may change their minds and get married.—Fayette Review.

You've hit the wrong place, Bro Yost. There are too many young men around here who can't take care of themselves to allow that number of young ladies to be running around without a hubby. Perhaps it was Waterloo you had reference to.

A fistic encounter occurred on the street Saturday at midnight, after the dance. We learn that the trouble commenced in the dance hall and ended in a pugilistic exhibition on the street.—Edon Commercial.

Speaking upon the crusade against gambling in Toledo, the Fayette Review says: "It has been one of the curses of mankind for ages. The disease affects all classes and both sexes. It is the same old desire to get something for nothing and there is scarcely a man of us who will not take advantage of it when once the chances are in our favor. Wherever you go you find people biting on everything that looks as if they might win. From the shell game up to the stock exchange men are ever ready to take a chance on winning something by doing nothing. You can't kill this disease until you make over the human race, and you must make over the race without the wild desire to get rich without labor. And more, you can't suppress it by arresting a few of the gambling places during a municipal campaign. You can't make a big bluffing noise and expect the gamblers to run for cover and the people to turn their minds from the alluring chances of winning a good hand at some kind of a game of chance. There is not a hamlet in the country where there is not a bunch of fellows who play for stakes. They will play de spite the law, the arrests and the threats. Even after places are pulled and the courts put the gamblers on their good behavior, they will continue and if there is no place for them they will wander out in the country and play beneath the trees. To the Review it seems that if a man is fool enough to spend his money on any kind of a game of chance, he ought to lose it. Usually if he does not lose it that way he will be frittered away in some other useless manner. So what is accomplished by pulling one sort of place and letting the others go free? What's the use of taking the dog by the tail? What's the use of bluffing as they do in the games you try to stop? If you are playing the game play her straight, and begin your reform work at the beginning. If you are to let some of the joints go free because of the moneyed respectability of those who belong to it let the others go free for the reason that their desires, too, should be respected. The desires of one are just as important and just as pure as the other and government should not be instituted for a few and against the many.

Notice of Collection of Ditch Assessments

Notice is hereby given to the owners of lands against which there are assessments for benefits for the proposed construction of the Warren A. Mason drain No. 850, as confirmed by the board of commissioners of DeKalb county, Indiana, that I, the undersigned superintendent of construction of said work and drainage, will require such assessments for benefits to be paid at the Knisely Bros. & Co. bank in Butler, Indiana, as follows, to-wit:

Ten per cent thereof on the 22nd day of each successive month, commencing with November 22, 1909, and continuing until sufficient funds have been so received by me to pay all costs and expenses incident to the construction of said work, together with cost of material and labor used and employed therein.

Mr. Voter!

You have a think coming. You should make some investigations before Nov. 2, so that you will be prepared to vote intelligently. We ask you to lay aside party prejudice and vote for the man who in your judgment will look after the city's affairs in a fair and business like way. We believe you will find such men on the democrat ticket. Our city is not so large but what you can easily get the past reputation of every man running for office, and that is what you should do. We can only judge a man's future by the past. If you were going to enter into business relations with some one, or if you were going to employ an agent to handle your money and conduct your affairs you would want to know something of his past. That is why you should learn all you can about the two tickets and then lay aside old habits and vote for your own best interests. Go to the candidates and find out where they stand on certain problems which will be brought up during their term of office. There are, so we are told, some very important matters to be brought before the next board, and if you get your man you will be represented. Above all get to the polls and vote for somebody.

$175,000.00 FIRE NO INSURANCE

Fortunately this great loss is divided among many owners, the greatest loss may not exceed $5,000. Many men fought bravely for hours to conquor the flames, but they did not succeed until hundreds of acres of woods, meadows, fields and hundreds of rods of fence were burned. This is a brief and conservative statement of the annual loss to Indiana farmers; caused by forest fires, most of which could have been avoided. The State Board of Forestry is active in trying to stay this loss. They have had printed on muslin the Indiana Fire law, which provides that one may be fined not less than $5.00 nor more than $50.00 for setting fire to woods, besides being liable for all damages done. These signs are 12 x 18 inches and are to be tacked up at prominent cross-roads, etc. They are free for the asking, address "State Board of Forestry, Indianapolis," stating how many you will tack up.

Many a Butler Citizen Knows How Sure They Are

Nothing uncertain about the work of Doan's Kidney Pills in Butler. There is plenty of positive proof of this in the testimony of citizens. Such evidence should convince the most skeptical doubter. Read the following statement:

W. S. Chapman, Cherry Street, Butler, Ind., says: "I have taken Doan's Kidney Pills procured from Phillips' drug store and they have always brought the best of results. I was subject to attacks of backache for several years and often when I stooped, sharp pains would suddenly catch me in the kidneys and make it almost impossible for me to straighten. This trouble was generally worse after I caught cold and at such times I was in great distress. When Doan's Kidney Pills were recommended to me, I at once began their use and in return for the benefit they brought, I am pleased to endorse them."

CUPID'S PRANKS RECORDED HERE

Grover Sapp, the B. & O. detective at Garrett, who, it is alleged, brutally assaulted George Burns a few days ago procured a license last week to marry Elda Harmon, of St. Joe. Rev. Elliot, of the Presbyterian church, later performed the ceremony making them man and wife.

At the home of the bride's parents, Mr. and Mrs. Add Quince, on East Quincy street, at eight o'clock last night, was held the marriage of Miss Edna Quince, who, until the granting her her divorce Wednesday afternoon, was Mrs. Edna Brogan to Wilkie Hughes. The ceremony was performed by the Rev. D. V. Williams, pastor of the Methodist church, and was witnessed only by the immediate relatives of the bride. The newly married couple left last night on a few days wedding trip.—Courier.

That license to marry is granted to numerous persons unfit to enter into martial relations, unfit from moral, mental and physical standpoints, is the contention of Dr. David H. Reeder of Laporte, a publicist. Dr. Reeder asserts the careless methods used in granting of marriage licenses are black spots on a supposedly civilized country and adds it shall be his purpose to force legislation compelling all applicants for marriage to pass examination at the hands of competent licensing boards.

Don Burley and Laura W. Woodcox two of St. Joe's young people, celebrated Thursday of the Fall Festival just right by taking an hour off and slipping over to the M. E. parsonage and having the Rev. W. B. Freeland tie the matrimonial knot. They returned in time to partake of the wedding anniversary supper of both C. C. and I. M. Woodcox, brothers of the bride, at the former's home, they having been married fifteen and four years on that date. While the wedding had been expected for some time by a few, it was quite a surprise to others. The bride is the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Washington Woodcox of this place and has a wide acquaintance. She is a graduate of the St. Joe High School. The groom is the only son of Mr. and Mrs. Dennis Burley, who resides west of town, and is a hustling young farmer. Mr. and Mrs. Burley will perhaps live on the farm with his parents.

THE NEWS joins their many friends in extending congratulations.—St. Joe News.

Thursday evening at 6:30 o'clook, Mort Wilson and Miss Mary Snell were happily wedded by the Rev. Elliott at the Presbyterian parsonage at Auburn in the presence of but immediate relatives. The ceremony was impressively performed.

After the marriage the bride and groom accompanied by Mr. and Mrs. Frank Draggoo and William Snell, of Bluffton, repaired to the home of the bride's mother, where a sumptuous repast greeted them. A delightful social session followed, in which congratulations were conferred upon the couple. The contracting parties enjoy a wide acquaintanceship in Auburn and vicinity and their friends can only be counted by the number of acquaintances they have.

The bride, an accomplished young lady, was the daughter of the late William Snell. She is held in the highest esteem by all. The groom for four years faithfully served as trustee of this township. He is now employed at the Auburn Automobile factory.

Mr. and Mrs. Wilson will in the near future move onto the former's farm for future abode. The well wishes of a host of friends accompany them on their matrimonial career.

A pretty little custom is observed in the British navy whenever an officer gets married. Two wreaths are hoisted in the most conspicuous manner, and interlocked with them and hanging from them are colored ribbons. These hang from 8 a. m. till sunset on the wedding day. The cost of the wreath is generally subscribed by the officer's shipmates.

Pianos at a Discount of 20 to 40 Per Cent

When Lyon & Healy, of Chicago, undertook to put in new flooring in their entire piano department it became necessary to move a vast number of Upright pianos so that the work of the carpenters might not be hampered.

To move these pianos quickly, Lyon & Healy offer them at a discount of 20 to 40 per cent. Some of these pianos have been slightly used, but have been put through the Lyon & Healy factory and are practically as good as new. These are no cheap factory pianos, but pianos of makes of good reputation.

What Lyon & Healy have done is to mark all these superb pianos (and there are hundreds of them) at greatly reduced prices. The response upon the part of the public is marvelous.

If you know the prices usually paid for good standard makes of pianos, you will need no second invitation to write to Lyon & Healy, Wabash Avenue and Adams Street, Chicago, for alteration sale list and terms, for you can secure a genuine $300 Upright for about $190, or other bargains in proportion.

Lyon & Healy give their own guarantee with every one of these pianos, regardless of make. Nothing like this opportunity has ever been given to music teachers, students, and music lovers heretofore. 1t

The Influence of Dress

THE BADLY DRESSED MAN

Clothes that are too small for a man make him feel as though his nakedness were insufficiently covered and that it is almost indecent for him to mingle with modest, self-respecting people; and if the clothes he wears are too large for him, his spirits are crushed by the conviction that his presence is disagreeable even to his friends because of them. A tight armhole hurts like a boil; a coat too high at the neck is as an annoying as a bandage; trousers that draw up far above the ankie when a man, sitting, crosses his legs, make him feel as if he were making a disgusting display of his anatomy, and a waistcoat that fails to connect with his trousers as it should, causes almost as much discomfort as a mustard plaster.

THE WELL DRESSED MAN

Clothes that are not only artistic, fashionable, becoming appropriate and comfort giving, but that fit properly, seem almost as much a part of the wearer as his nose, or arms, or legs, interest him as his facial expression does and concern him as much as they would if they were physical organs. They contribute to his pride as much as well deserved compliments, and are as joy-giving ar a good appeptite face to face with a good dinner, and as inspiring as ambition. They not only make life seem much more worth living to the man who wears them, than it would be if he were badly dressed, but develop in him many virtues and make him regard his tailor as a public benefactor to whom civilized mankind is greatly indebted.

Al Briggs is advertising a horse, buggy and harness, also his household goods to be sold at auction on Saturday afternoon at 2 o'clock. Mr. Briggs expects to go to the soldiers home at Marion.

The Waterloo Dawn shows a decided improvement in way of mechanical appearance. The HERALD editor would suggest that the name be changed, however, from Dawn to Jug Handle since it is a full fledged champion of the stuff which made Milwaukee famous.

Mr. and Mrs. Jacob Mumaw, of Edon, Ohio, spent Sunday with their Butler friends. He is manager of the telephone exchange at that place and is a valuable man to them as he is familiar with every detail of the business. Mrs. M. has not yet become acclimated to the town.

The democratic voters of Butler will have no reason for not voting a straight ticket this fall. The candidates are all men of honor and integrity who have made good in a business way. They stand for public improvements to a man, and we believe that if elected, they will make a record superior to any previous board.

Prof. J. E. Sturgis left his home yesterday for Lexington, Ky., where he will assist in a four weeks meeting. From there he will go to Lincoln, Neb., to join Evangelist Yeuell, one of the greatest evangelists in the United States. After touring a few eastern states they will go to California where they will finish an eight months engagement.

Levi Husselman is reported as some better the past week.

Mr. and Mrs. C. W. Beard and Mr. and Mrs. Walter Chapman spent Sunday at the Beard cottage at Cold Springs.

Andrew Kramer of Indianapolis, has been visiting with Dr. Kramer and wife of this place and relatives near Edgerton.

The Philomathean club will meet Thursday afternoon with Mrs. Wm. Rickey. They will take up the very interesting study of "Paradise Lost."

Miss Minnie Swagley, of Edgerton, Ohio, was the guest of Warren Murch Friday morning enroute from St. Louis, Mo.

Miss Grace Walker left Sunday evening for Blakeslee, Ohio, for a visit with her parents, before going to Toledo, where she will make her future home.

Frank Abram has returned from Adrian, Mich., where he has been studying music. He has purchased the Star theatre. Frank deserves the patronage of the people.

Mr. and Mrs. C. W. Bell and children, of Wauseon, Ohio, came Saturday for a visit with A. Price and wife. Mr. Bell returned home Sunday, but Mrs. Bell will remain for a visit.

The Lake Shore is putting in the grading for a half mile of new siding which later will be connected up to make the fourth track. This will probably be done early next spring.

The HERALD spoke last week of G. E. Crider, of Montpelier, Ohio, having invented a new type of gasoline engine which should have been G. L. Crider, who is also a Wabash engineer.

The members of the Lutheran church are requested to remain next Sunday after Sunday school, as there is important business to attend to.

BY ORDER OF SECRETARY.

Wm. Oberlin, David Hinds, Wm. Holtzberg and Charley Hiner were at Cold Springs, Monday, duck hunting. They brought home 256 hens, and there has been a big feasting of "wild duck" in Butler.

Marcus Yager and family, of Grabill, were guests of Mr. and Mrs. J. R. Zimmerman over Sunday. They came up with Mr. and Mrs. Cyrus Hawk who were on their way to Edon, Ohio, in an automobile.

The Knepper residence on West Main St. will add greatly to the beauty of that street, while the John Lowe residence and Ed Gengnagel residence, which are all new, will add to the appearance of the other end of the street.

In the Fisher Shipp Company of concert artists and entertainers the management has combined the two prime essentials of a popular lyceum organization—high standard of individuality and perfect concerted work in the ensemble features which form a large part of their program.

George Greenwalt showed the writer a paper printed in the great state of Texas which comes as near being a gold mine as anything we have ever seen. It contained 234 columns of legal notices (sheriff sales) which if paid the usual rate will bring the publisher $3,916 for the one issue.

NEW VIGOR FOR BAD BACKS.

How to Make a Weak Back Better.

Women who suffer with backache, bearing-down pains, dizziness, constant dull, tired feelings, will find hope in the advice of Mrs. M. Working, 315 Fulton Ave., Rochester, Ind., who said: "I suffered everything with pain in the back, too frequent passages of the kidney secretions, swelling of the ankles and joints and a general feeling of weakness. I used about everything said to be good for kidney trouble, but Doan's Kidney Pills brought me the first real help and three boxes cured me."

Remember the name—Doan's. Sold by all dealers. 50 cents a box. Foster-Milburn Co., Buffalo, N. Y.

Qualifying for the Service.

In his "Memoirs of Eighty Years," Dr. Gordon Hake, who was a nephew of Gen. Charles Gordon, tells how he won the approbation of his uncle, later celebrated as the hero of Khartum. It was by a boyish feat which he learned in his school days. Most boys feel a vaulting ambition at that age, but too few of them in later years fulfill its aims.

I may mention here, in taking leave of my boyhood, that there was a bath at Islington called Peerless Pool, to which in summer the boys of the school were sent to bathe.

It was a large mass of water, oblong in shape, with a wide promenade. There we would spend a whole afternoon, sent there by the authorities when the half-holiday was at hand.

There, to excite the wonder and applause of the other boys, I punished myself by taking the longest run to the water's edge that was obtainable within the enclosure, and by leaping somersault-fashion into the air to a great height and reaching the water in a seated posture.

In doing this I inflicted on myself a punishment equal to that of being flogged.

Being somewhat sheepish at the age of fifteen, I did not stand very high in the estimation of my uncle, General Gordon, while staying with him at Woolwich; but one day he took me down to the Thames to bathe.

There was a platform, probably for the soldiers to jump from into the water. This afforded me a long run, and I resolved on performing my feat.

My uncle was perfectly surprised at it, and often alluded to it with surprise in later years. After this display of my pluck, he was much in favor of my going into the army.

With Emphasis.

"Yes," said Mrs. Highmore, "we have just returned from a trip through the highways and byways of Europe."

"Just what do you call the 'byways'?" asked Mrs. Upsome.

"Well, they are the places where my husband—er—used strong language about the hotel accommodations."

CHILDREN SHOWED IT.

Effect of Their Warm Drink in the Morning.

"A year ago I was a wreck from coffee drinking and was on the point of giving up my position in the school room because of nervousness.

"I was telling a friend about it and she said, 'We drink nothing at meal time but Postum, and it is such a comfort to have something we can enjoy drinking with the children.'

"I was astonished that she would allow the children to drink any kind of coffee, but she said Postum was the most healthful drink in the world for children as well as for older ones, and that the condition of both the children and adults showed that to be a fact.

"My first trial was a failure. The cook boiled it four or five minutes and it tasted so flat that I was in despair but determined to give it one more trial. This time we followed the directions and boiled it fifteen minutes after the boiling began. It was a decided success and I was completely won by its rich, delicious flavor. In a short time I noticed a decided improvement in my condition and kept growing better and better month after month, until now I am perfectly healthy, and do my work in the school room with ease and pleasure. I would not return to the nerve-destroying regular coffee for any money."

ARMIES AND NAVIES OF THE NATIONS

COST OF THE WORLD'S GREAT ARMIES.

COST OF THE WORLD'S GREAT NAVIES.

These illustrations are of special interest at his time when there is a suggestion that some agreement should be reached by which the ever increasing expenditure of the powers might be lessened. The relative burdens which their increasing budgets, due to international rivalry, impose on the chief powers of the world, indicate rapid progress toward national bankruptcy. The French budget of twenty years ago amounted, roughly, to £95,000,000. To-day it amounts to nearly £159,000,000. At the same rate, in twenty years, it will total over £222,000,000. In the pictures, the sums given as representing the annual expenditure of the powers on their navies and their armies are taken from the most recent edition of the "Statesman's Year Book," and are in each instance the figures for the latest year published. Obviously, such figures must change from time to time. In a particular year, for instance, the United States spends on her navy far more than, say, Germany may spend on hers in the same time, although the navy of the latter is larger than the navy of the former. In another year the position may be reversed.

It has been well said that if you would have peace, you must prepare for war, and it is noticeable that this is the attitude taken by all the great powers at the moment. It may be recalled also that in a speech during the visit of the Czar the King said: "I am glad, sire, that you should have had an opportunity of seeing, perhaps, the most powerful and largest fleet that has ever assembled, but I trust that your majesty will never look upon these ships as symbols of war, but on the contrary as a protection to our coasts and commerce, and, above all, for upholding the interests of peace." —(From the London Illustrated News.)

SAVING THE BODY.

May Be Accomplished on the Other Side of Your Outer Door.

There are folks who annually exclaim: "We simply must go somewhere! The idea of staying home all summer! Why, we'd die!" My friend, you will not die before your time if you will get outdoors every possible chance, and if there is no outdoors to your home, you had, indeed, better go somewhere else and stay. But purge your mind that you have to go 100 miles in a sleeping car to get the outdoors and scrape off the moldy notion that the moment you get outdoors you must tear around like a colt, says F. L. Freeland in the Circle. Sit perfectly still and try to comprehend this large and everlasting fact: Outdoors is just like the other side of your door, waiting, like opportunity, for a chance at you. If your door opens upon a stationary odor piled up from some noxious industry, you should remove, exactly as if the odor were a visible pile of filth. The prime duty of every man is to locate his home so that it is surrounded by unadulterated outdoors. And somewhere in that outdoors, somewhere, you certainly will have room to swing a hammock! And, oh, who can tell the worth of a hammock! That man can who can truly estimate the value of utter rest. Lack of rest at the right moment, as in a fine machine the lack of a drop of oil, throws everything out of gear and the engineer into a frenzy. The woman who never sees the ocean, nor the hills, nor a stream-bisected pasture, nevertheless can step out of her steaming kitchen, toss off her apron and throw herself into the soothing caress of a hammock with almost, if not indeed all, the assurance of the some recuperation that a two weeks' romp might give her, if she does it at the moment when the machine needs the oil, every time. A hammock slung in the coolest spot of anybody's outdoors is salvation of body and mind. Just because your soul is saved or even because it isn't, don't neglect your body and mind. Let a man dip into a hammock for fifteen minutes after the day's work and he speedily will wonder how he came to be cross with his wife for asking if he felt the heat in the office.

No Complaining.

A writer in Tit-Bits says that a wealthy gentleman living in North Devon, who took a great interest in the church, offered to give the choir a treat, and decided on the really princely one of taking them for a week to Paris.

He escorted them himself to places of interest and beauty in that charming city, but not once during their whole stay, or even on their return, did one of the men say to him that he had liked the trip or had enjoyed himself.

Naturally anxious to know whether they had done so, a few days after their return he asked one of the churchwardens, a farmer in the village, whether he thought the men had enjoyed their time in Paris. The churchwarden cogitated for a moment or two.

"Well, sir," he said at length, "I ain't heard no complaints."

Faith and Hope.

Doubts may flit around me, or seem to close their evil wings, and settle down; but, so long as I imagine that the earth is hallowed, and the light of heaven retains its sanctity on the Sabbath—while the blessed sunshine lives within me—never can my soul have lost the instinct of its faith.—Nathaniel Hawthorne.

HOW THE SEXTANT WAS USED BY EXPLORERS.

Diagram Shows Manner in Which the Instrument Enabled Cook and Peary to Tell the Way to the North Pole.

The sextant, whose service in polar trips has been reported by the explorers, is an instrument small enough to be conveniently held in the hand, and is equally well adapted for measuring the altitude of celestial objects, in order to obtain the latitude and local time, or for measuring the angle between the moon and sun, or the moon and a fixed star, to ascertain the longitude.

It is called sextant because the measure is recorded on an arc of 60 degrees, one-sixth of a circle. It consists of a frame, usually of metal, stiffened by cross braces. The arc at the bottom of the frame is marked off with double the number of degrees actually measured. This is done because the glasses attached to the instrument give a double reflection of the objects observed and thus form an angle with reference to each other equal to only half the angular distance between such objects, one of which is seen directly and the other by reflection. The arc of 120 degrees thus records the actual angle.

Midway on the frame on one side is a telescope and opposite on the other leg of the frame is a glass, transparent in the upper half and silvered in the lower half. Both the telescope (E-T in the accompanying figure) and the glass (H) in the figure, are firmly attached to the frame. At the top of the frame is a mirror (C in the figure), which is movable by means of an arm (R-M in the figure) to which it is fastened. C is called the index glass and the arm (R-M) revolves around it. At M is a shifting scale for making fractional measurements and called a vernier.

The observer takes the instrument in his hand and holds the telescope horizontally. Looking through the telescope he may see the horizon through the transparent surface of the horizon glass H. Then, if wishing to bring the sun into line, he manipulates the mirror C as a child handles a bit of looking glass for the purpose of catching the sun's glare, and throwing it into the eyes of a companion. He turns the arm R-M until the mirror C catches its reflection and throws it back to the silvered surface of the glass H. When the sun is thus made to coincide with the horizon the section of the graduated arc over which the arm R-M has passed indicates the measure of the angle in degrees, which is exactly determined by the movable fractional scale or vernier.

Arabian astronomers are credited with having used a sextant as far back as the year 995, with a radius of 59 feet 9 inches. The modern instrument was invented independently about 1730 by Thomas Godfrey of Philadelphia and Captain Hadley of the British navy.

SIXTY YEARS A HARPIST.

Rosalie Spohr a Figure in Berlin's Musical and Social Life.

One of the most interesting characters in the musical life of Berlin is Rosalie Spohr, the harpist, who is a niece of the great violinist Louis Spohr, an exchange says. She made her first appearance in public on Dec. 13, 1849, at a concert given by Jennie Lind. She attracted attention first because of her distinguished musical descent, but after the world had once heard her her art made her famous.

There are few women before the public to-day who play the harp as virtuosi, although one sees them occasionally in the opera orchestras. So it is difficult nowadays to realize that Rosalia Spohr toured Europe in triumph. She found in Franz Liszt a devoted friend and enthusiastic admirer and he was proud to play with her at Weimar as well as give her the benefit of his artistic advice. Her career as a public performer ended after about six years. Then she became the wife of Count Saurma and the stage knew her no more. She still lives in Berlin, more than 80 years old, but enthusiastic in her devotion to the instrument with which she won the triumphs of her brief professional career. For three hours every day she practices the harp, and her technique has for that reason remained very complete for one of her age. Her talent was in a measure hereditary, since her aunt was a well-known harpist in her day. It was through her playing that Rosalie Spohr, who had begun her musical life as a pianist, turned her attention to the harp.

A widow for more than twenty years, it has been her devotion to her art that made life interesting to her during all this time. Her education was sound, in the first place, for she studied for two years under the harpist Grimm, who allowed her to play in public at the end of that period, although it was one of his principles that a harpist should study for ten years. Countess Rosalie has been an intimate friend of the German royal family, and both Friedrich and the empress were delighted to hear her play. Nowadays she is a unique figure in the musical and social life of Berlin and an inspiration to the younger students, who see what a joy and consolation an art may be to one who has acquired it faithfully.

Time.

"It's a sort o' curious," said Uncle Jerry Peebles; "but when a man is workin' for another man he's always a wantin' to go and see the ball game. When he's workin' on his own time he gets stingy with it and can't spare it."

SICK MAN ON WALL STREET.

Effect of Jay Gould's Illness and Death on the Stock Market.

Jay Gould was a man of frail physique. In the evening of his career the state of his health became a matter of intense speculative interest in Wall street. On rumors that he was dangerously ill prices would fall; on these rumors being authoritatively and convincingly denied, prices would recover. When there was nothing much else in the stock market for speculators to think about or trade upon, days would be spent in ridiculous and futile alarms. At length Mr. Gould became a chronic invalid, the strain of his life having hopelessly undermined his health, and though by this time his affairs were so composed that his death would not be likely to upset the stock market, the fiction was kept alive among speculators that fluctuations in his physical condition were of the utmost importance.

The New York newspapers took part in the discussion, says the New York Evening Post, and when Mr. Gould, accompanied by several doctors, went to Saratoga Springs, staff correspondents went along to see for themselves. Their reports disagreed as hopelessly as the Wall street rumors.

One morning this paper, whose correspondent at Saratoga Springs had been "writing Mr. Gould up" for well, sent down the story that the subject of all this commotion had done a five-mile walk across country, had climbed rail fences and leaped hedges with the agility of a schoolboy, and had returned fairly glowing with health. That made a day for the bulls in Wall street. They advanced prices furiously. The paper whose correspondent had been on the other side queried him in harsh terms. Was it true? The next day he sent down his story, declaring it was true that Mr. Gould had gone five miles across country; but it was a terrible pity. His condition was such that his doctors had resorted to heroic measures, and carried and dragged him over that distance, and had brought him back a tottering, visible wreck. He would perhaps never be seen outdoors again. That made a day for the bears in Wall street.

Five years after all this Mr. Gould died, and the event caused hardly any commotion in Wall street, Missouri Pacific advanced.

Buried Treasures.

For me is buried treasure
By many a misty coast;
But ah! its tale and measure
Long, long ago I lost.

Or if Phoenician mintage,
Or crusted bowls divine
That held Alcinous' vintage
Or late Falernian wine!

If Egypt's jewelled scarab;
Or moonlight gleam of jade;
Or magic dirk of Arab,
Or Scythian idol-blade!

Or painted scroll or quiver,
Or Inca's gold-in-cave;
Or pelf from diamond river;
Grisamber from sea wave;

Or, from Varangian barrow
Some amulet uncouth;
Or but this flinthead arrow
From hilltops roamed in youth;

I count my treasure buried
By many a misty coast
The vanished lives, as varied,
That long ago I lost!

Whereof a cloudy token
Across my memory drives;
But no spell lifts unbroken
My many sunken lives.
—Edith M. Thomas.

OLD RAILROAD STRINGERS.

Roadbed Used Before the Time of Iron Rails and Crossties.

The warehouse of G. S. Mercier in his village has some curious and historic timber in it, a Point of Rocks correspondent of the Baltimore Sun writes. The joists are made from the "stringers" which were used on the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad when the cars were drawn by horses, before the days of the locomotive. These "stringers" were oak timbers, about 6 inches square, laid longitudinally on the track just as the T rails are now laid. Upon these timbers iron straps about two inches wide and a half inch thick were spiked, and upon these straps the wheels ran. To fit upon these thin straps the flanges of the wheels must have been very slight. Now and then the end of a strap would get loose, the wheels would get under it and the iron would penetrate the floor, and sometimes passengers were severely wounded by them. They were known as "snake heads." To several of the stringers now used as joists in Mr. Mercier's warehouse the straps are still attached, and it is doubtful whether anywhere in the world there is another specimen intact of this kind of "rail" used in the infancy of railroad construction. The warehouse was built about sixty years or more ago, at the time the primitive rails were supplanted by crossties and iron rails.

For a year or two, beginning in 1832, Point of Rocks was the western terminal of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad, pending the litigation and the settlement by the Legislature of the right of way between the river and the mountain at this place. Large quantities of goods and produce were brought here, and the old warehouse in which they were stored is still standing and in good repair. It is now used as a hotel.

POPULAR SCIENCE

A year ago the announcement was made of the discovery of petroleum on the shore of the Red Sea. Since then a well has been sunk to a depth of 1,400 feet, the estimated daily yield of which is 300 barrels. The petroliferous strata are found at Jemseh, on the African shore of the sea, about 150 miles south of Suez.

Very little is yet known in Europe and America of the many varieties of mushrooms that grow in Japan. The most famous of these is the shii-take, which is the name of the evergreen oak on the wood of which it is principally grown. Trees about six inches in diameter are felled and cut up into lengths of six feet. The logs are scarred on the back, and laid on the ground for about three years. Then they are stacked in rows in a shady place, and soon become covered with the mushrooms. Two crops are gathered in a year. After yielding one crop the logs are soaked in water, beaten with a wooden mallet, and again set up. In a few days new mushrooms begin to sprout upon them. The shii-take is a great favorite in Japan, being used in many dishes, but more frequently in soups. It is also largely exported.

The opening of a railroad from a point near Luxor into the Libyan desert has rendered easy the approach to the oasis of Khargeh, which is regarded as a typical example of these isolated centers of life. For three years just past H. J. L. Beadnell has resided in this oasis, studying the phenomena of springs, moving sands, wells, and so forth. The Libyan oases are deep depressions in a lofty plateau, which has a maximum elevation of nearly 2,000 feet, but the bottoms of the oases are only from 100 to 300 feet above sea-level. They are underlain by beds of sandstone which are the sources of the water-supply. Artesian wells 400 feet deep form practically inexhaustible means of irrigation, and such deep wells have been used from ancient times. The depressions were once the beds of lakes, and the water in the sandstone probably has its sources in the Abyssinian highlands.

Although the objects are often only such as would be called "sentimental," there are no stronger supporters of movements for the protection of remarkable natural phenomena than scientific societies and individuals devoted to scientific work. Prof. John M. Clarke calls attention to the lead that Germany has taken in this matter. There a hundred motives induce interference for the protection of "natural monuments." In the forests of Luneburg an old gnarled fir tree is guarded "for its very age and fascinating ugliness." Near Hamburg a patch of dwarf birch is protected as a rare survivor of the postglacial flora. Schleswig has set aside a low knoll crowned with a huge glacial boulder. Brandenburg cherishes a swamp wherein rare botanic specimens are found, and Marienwerder a little lake in the woods where rare water-birds nest. Professor Clarke remarks upon the richness of our country in such monuments, and the constant danger of their extinction.

Trains Women as Secretaries.

Miss Ethel Dickens, granddaughter of Charles Dickens, has undertaken the work of training young Englishwomen for secretaries. Already she is satisfied her work will be a success. Miss Dickens intends to provide secretaries for many kinds of work. Typewriting and shorthand are taught, in addition to a great variety of general knowledge. Miss Dickens says a young woman who can speak several languages or arrange a garden party or send out circulars for an athletic meet is the secretary who runs the best chance of competing with the men who now practically monopolize the field. Miss Dickens herself passed several years as secretary to a member of parliament, and resigned to engage in the work of fitting other young women for similar employment.

Labor distress in New Zealand is sending many skilled and unskilled workers to Australia. Public works expenditure is reduced from $12,000,000 to $7,000,000 a year. One-seventh (120,000) of the people depend upon the state for their living, and all departments are retrenching. That is one of the chief dangers of public ownership of public utilities and producing works.

English vegetarians are awfully sore on the Japs for proving traitors to their old vegetarian mode of living and are predicting endless calamity, even ruin, saying: "When rice-eating peoples take up meat the result is always disastrous to their health." Japs know what to eat and are too wise to listen to any British advice intended to weaken them as warriors.—New York Press.

The Germans are developing their high school at Kiao-chau, China, with their usual thoroughness. Its scope is even larger than the proposed Hong-Kong University. Except a grant of $10,000 from the Chinese Government, the whole cost is paid by the German Government. German text-books and other works are translated into Chinese in a department of the school, says the London Times.

The industrial census of Germany for 1907 (just published by the German imperial bureau of statistics) gives 4,025,591 industrial concerns employing 14,348,389 persons, of whom 3,510,466 were women. The increase in twelve years is 4,079,120—a ratio about four times as great as that of the employing concerns. These figures do not include railroad, postal, telegraph and telephone employes.

"Adventurer" is a word, once highly respectable, that has degenerated with the lapse of time. It was once a compliment to call a gentleman an adventurer, and the Merchant Venturers of Bristol, England, are still respected. The Hudson's Bay Company dates back from May 2, 1670. In the royal charter it was described as the "Governor and Company of Adventurers of England Trading in Hudson's Bay."

"Alcohol is really the Arabic "al kohl"—"al" being the definite article, as in "algebra" (the reduction) and "alkali" (the soda ashes), and "kohl," the black powder wherewith the eastern beauties stained their eyelids. But "alcohol" came to be used for any finely triturated or sublimated powder, and then for sublimated liquids. "Alcohol of wine," being the most interesting of these, it gradually took the name entirely to itself.

Use of the fork is comparatively modern. The original fork was two-pronged, and its adoption was held to betoken an unusual degree of elegance and refinement. "The taste for cleanliness has preserved the use of steel forks with two prongs," writes Lady Newdigate. (She spoke to the closing years of the eighteenth century.) "With regard to little bits of meat, which cannot so well be taken hold of with the two-pronged forks, recourse is had to the knife, which is broad and round at the extremity." Peas at that time were eaten with a knife.

What is perhaps the most curious book in the world is possessed by the Prince de Ligne. This work is neither printed nor a manuscript, the text being formed of letters cut in vellum and pasted on blue paper. Notwithstanding this extraordinary method of presenting the text, the book is as easy of perusal as if printed in the boldest type. All the characters shown are cut with marvelous dexterity and precision. This unique volume bears the title, "The Book of All Passions of Our Lord Jesus Christ, with Characters Not Composed of Any Materials." It is said that Rudolph II. offered no less than 11,000 ducats for this wonderful product of the bookmaker's art, but the offer was refused.—London Globe.

Pushing Lines of Wires Across Missouri, Illinois and Indiana.

The quiet contest for a place in the telegraph business which has been in progress for some time in Missouri, Illinois and Indiana, has resulted in a complete victory for the new independent company, the Telepost. Wherever its lines have been established it has put into effect its universal schedule of flat rates, which mean a reduction of telegraph charges such as only this new company can give without loss of money through the use of the inventions of Patrick B. Delaney, by which remarkable automatic machines do the work of the old hand method of transmission.

The Telepost Company is bringing competition into the heart of the zones of the greatest volume of telegraph business, viz.: New England, the North Mississippi Valley region, and the Washington, Philadelphia, New York belt. The lines are established and thriving in New England, work is going ahead with all possible speed in and around New York, and now in the North Central district, in which the main centers are Chicago, St. Louis, Springfield, Indianapolis and Kansas City, another victory has been gained by securing extensions into Indianapolis for the line now operating from St. Louis to Terre Haute. In a few weeks' time Indianapolis and St. Louis and Indianapolis and Chicago will be connected. Westward the work is pushing on beyond Sedalia, Mo.

The effect of a sharp competition and reduced rates, as evidenced in New England, has been to stimulate business, and justifies the conclusion that experts are correct in their opinion that with the rates cut in half the telegraph business will be trebled in volume, which has been the general experience in England, France and other countries where the telegraphs have been put on a basis of modern efficiency and reasonable charges.

Sold Them Shoes Instead of Booze.

Two years passed during which, for sixteen months, there had been no saloons in Mayfield. Isador Bruner bent over the balance-sheet of his year's business. A smile of satisfaction widened upon his countenance. Turning to that saddest of all sad items, "Outstanding Accounts," he saw that it was less than it had been for many years. His eye ran down the long list of negroes who had paid, and the short list of delinquents. Among those who had paid in full were many who had habitually fallen behind in previous years. He had always had to foreclose their accounts, sell out, and start them over again. Bruner began to understand the causes—too much time in the barrooms and too little time in the fields. This year these negroes did not have the customary charges against them—"Order to Jerry Sims, $5"—amounting to fifty or seventy-five dollars. Instead of paying this money to Jerry, Bruner sold shoes and hats to the negroes.—Success Magazine.

An Honest Boy Rewarded.

Honesty is appreciated—even among politicians. During a recent political convention in North Carolina a newsboy named Cicero Alexander sold a paper to a delegate who gave him a dollar and was to wait for his change. The boy on returning, could not find his customer and began to cry. The chairman of the convention, impressed by his honesty, announced the matter before the whole assemblage—the result being not only that the man who had the change coming to him let the boy have it, but a collection of $19.35 was taken up for him by the delegates. Some one shouted that the youngster should be made State treasurer, and by unanimous vote the convention recommended him for chief page in the legislature.

The Law and the Airship

M. Bleriot, who flew across the English Channel in his compact little monoplane, has put a price of $2,000 upon the machine of his invention, and it is said that he has sold fifty-two aeroplanes for early delivery since the opening day of the Rheims meeting. It is estimated that the actual cost of the machine ready for flight and including the motor is not more than $600. There will of course be sharp competition in the manufacture of aeroplanes, and as both this country and Europe are swarming with inventors—every town has its genius toiling at the aviation problem—the market must soon be overstocked and prices cut. Second hand aeroplanes should be within the reach of a modest purse. Assuming, then, that with a little instruction anybody will be able to fly—one of the aviators at Rheims declared that manipulation of the aeroplane could be mastered more readily than driving the automobile—we may soon expect to see airships "aflight" in such numbers that their regulation will become the urgent concern of the lawyers and the Legislatures, which seem to be interchangeable terms.

In its last issue Bench and Bar speculates upon the adaptation of the law, common, statute and international, to the evolution of the aeroplane and the dirigible. It deals with the subject facetiously, but with a sobering sense of its growing importance. Trespass is the first form of suit to occur to the lawyer when the airship is mentioned. He thinks of the old maxim that the landowner has a proprietary right "usque ad coelum et usque ad orcum," and wonders whether an aeronaut skimming over a field or a garden will be liable in trespass. Waiving that point, how is the aeronaut to be identified if he injures a tenant physically or damages his house by dropping any of the furniture of the flying car in its transit? Would the plaintiff recover on the theory of nuisance, or would he have to prove negligence on the part of the aviator?

The service of process often causes a practitioner no little trouble. Apparently a defendant owning an aeroplane, or airship of any kind, could escape his creditors and his wife suing for divorce—not to speak of the police, which suggests a perplexing problem for the criminal courts—by taking to the air in the nick of time. This question is complicated by the necessity of getting out requisition papers when the defendant or the law breaker crosses the State boundary. Bench and Bar observes:

"Even if the creditor or his attorney possesses air navigating apparatus so as to be able to pursue the debtor, it is difficult to see how one could get near enough to the other to effect service without danger of a disastrous collision."

Just so. No court officer would care to take the risk of boarding the defendant's conveyance in midair by a flying leap. Provided the fugitive had gasolene or petrol to keep going long enough to flit from State to State, he would be immune from arrest, or at least his apprehension would become a very pretty problem in process. The question raised by this legal luminary that concerns rules of the road and the lights to be carried after dark does not appear to be much of a poser. It will be a long, long time before the air is congested with aerial travellers, and at present there is no prospect that the aeroplane will become a nightbird. Bench and Bar does not consider the customs problem, which seems to us the most baffling of all. How is the smuggler to be restrained, unless by a frontier guard with a rifle, or in the case of a dirigible by a company of artillery with a long range gun? Moreover, it might cost a nation with a far flung boundary line more to keep it patrolled than the amount of revenue derivable from honest entry of all goods imported. Even the punishment of death, or any other severe penalty, would not deter smugglers if the customs meshes were wide enough to slip through. Then there is the opportunity that the airship would afford to the "underworld"—a term that would give way to "overworld" when aeroplanes were as thick as blackberries. We absolutely refuse to discuss the crime phase of the subject; it is altogether illimitable and shadowy and had better be left to the masters of detective fiction.—New York Sun.

20 PARTNERS FOR A WALTZ.

German Custom Favors Young Men Who Arrive Late at a Dance.

Young men in London society hear far too much of their delinquencies in the matter of ballroom etiquette. They are accused of not caring to dance, of merely looking in for supper, or of spending their time in the smoking room instead of dancing. It is said that the young men of today in London cannot dance. There may be some truth in this, but their lack of dancing capacity is not the only reason they linger in the smoking rooms or merely go in for supper.

"What can your young men do?" queried a young German when his opinion on the subject was asked for. "Suppose a man happens to arrive late at a dance or if he is a stranger and knows very few people, he finds all the ladies he would like to dance with have their programmes filled up. It has happened to myself more than once," he went on plaintively. "As I am a stranger I often get invited to dances where I do not know people. I find all the programmes filled and I can only get the chance of dancing with the young ladies—well"—and politeness made him hesitate—"with those who do not dance very well, at least whose programmes are not filled up, and these are the very ones I would rather not dance with. So I go on to the next dance or to supper. What will you?"

"In Germany, he said, "it is altogether different. We do not dance through a whole waltz with one person. The ladies who dance well, the beauties, promise as many as twenty men to dance the same waltz with them. A beauty floats lightly around the room with one fellow, and then she smiles and bows to him, and one of the other twenty, who are all watching, comes on and has perhaps one more turn round the room or two. Then she is not obliged to sit out between dances with the man with whom she has danced. She can send him about his business, very politely of course, and sit out a few minutes with one and a few more with another. It is not at all that Germans dance better than Englishmen; it is merely that there are far more opportunities for dancing and far more trouble taken to secure novelty and attractions for dances."

In Vienna, which may be quoted as perhaps the very centre of Continental fashion and society life, there are many public dances during the season. In London fashionable people do not go to public dances and a bazaar in the cause of charity is apparently the only idea which suggests itself. With the exception of the Caledonian ball there is no really important annual charity dance in London, while in Vienna, typical of many Continental towns, there is a whole series of such dances.

The various guilds and associations, the press, the artistic societies, have their dances, all of which are attended by perhaps some member of the royal family and which are usually patronized by aristocratic ladies who are leaders in society, and who go, for part of an evening at least, and take large parties with them. These dances are often in domino, or in fancy dress, but they invariably form so great an attraction that the tickets sell rapidly, and the programmes are arranged with so much attention to special dances and revivals of old ones that a certain amount of time must be spent in rehearsing.—London Telegraph.

THE VETERAN BOARDER.

He Sets Forth a Simple Rule for the Guidance of the Inexperienced.

"How true it is," said the veteran boarder, "that we never know when we are well off.

"This is particularly true of life in boarding houses. We think how much better the food and cooking and the service might be in the place where we are, never thinking how much poorer we might find them elsewhere.

"At the same time there are certain things that it is wise to consider in the selection of a boarding house, one of these concerning the bounteousness of the table. You cannot live by dishes alone; you must have food; a pretty table would little please if there were on it nothing to eat; and so I suppose it will be conceded that in choosing a boarding place the question of whether we would get enough to eat or not would be an important if not indeed the primary consideration.

"Fortunately there is a simple way by which we can determine this before taking board permanently. Appearances are deceitful and we may sometimes be misled; but this simple way that I will now describe to you will at least serve as a useful guide.

"If you are wise you will eat a sample dinner in the house in advance pending negotiations; and if you find the meat portions served generous and the vegetables served to you in dishes from which you help yourself to so much as you desire, it is a fair presumption that in this house you would get enough to eat. The meat portions might not be very large, but if they were of fair dimensions and the vegetables were still served so that you could help yourself to whatever you wanted, and the bread supply was ample, why, then you might consider that here you would get enough to eat; but if the vegetables are served to you in little side dishes, containing portions dished out in the kitchen, why, then it is your own fault if you go astray.

"To be sure, the portions in the little dishes may be generous, but it isn't in reason to expect that they would be. Dished up in the kitchen, where the rule is economy, as in truth it has to be, for there is none too much profit in the boarding house business even at its best, there is a natural tendency to be skimpy in the spoonfuls, and to put not too many of them in a dish. In the kitchen they can keep control of what goes on the table and make a small supply suffice for many boarders, by the simple expedient of dividing it up into as many portions as may be required to make it go around. In short, where you can help yourself you get all you want; where you are helped in the kitchen you may get all you want or you may not.

"So in choosing a boarding place note for one thing, and I should say the first thing, in what manner the vegetables are served, and if they are put on the table in individual portions in little dishes, why, then you want to look out; and if you have any question about the size of the portions you had better give yourself the benefit of the doubt.

"A simple rule this may seem to be, but as to whether the table is generously supplied or not all experienced boarders find a sure guide in what comes in the little dishes."—New York Sun.

White Cloud Baby a Heavyweight.

THE NAUGHTY FLOWERS.

Some naughty flowers one summer said:
"We'll stay here all the year.
We will not mind the chilly snow,
Or days so dark and drear."

When autumn came, they said, "Oh, this
We will not mind one bit";
But when it came to winter,
They wished that it would quit.

DON'T LIKE SQUASH PIE.

"Curtis," said the teacher, "suppose I had two squash pies, and cut one into six pieces and the other into twelve pieces; which pie would you rather have a piece of?" "The one divided into twelve pieces," answered Curtis; "I don't like squash pie."—Philadelphia Record.

THE BIRDIE'S BATH.

It was midsummer in Western Washington and no rain had fallen in six weeks. Taking compassion upon my parched garden, I went out into the bright sunshine one noon to water it, using a finely perforated round nozzle which threw a bush-like spray, writes B. K. Daniels in the Sunday Magazine.

Almost before the first drops had reached the ground a humming bird darted out from a nearby apple tree, hovered for a moment in the outskirts of the shower, its iridescent back showing doubly beautiful through the rainbow-tinted mist, and then plunged bodily in, only to be swept away twenty feet by the force of the water. Nothing daunted, however, the little fellow returned and plunged in again and again, until, apparently wearied, he hovered at one side and thrust out his long, needlelike tongue toward the gleaming myriads of drops.

Forgetting for the moment that the humming bird is not insectivorous, I concluded that the tiny creature was attracted by the brilliant color display, mistaking the bright drops for flies, and when he perched on the tip of an apple tree branch near by I turned the shower upon him, expecting to see him dart out in pursuit of one of the deceiving drops. To my surprise, however, he clung to the branch, flapping his tiny wings, spreading and flirting his tail and preening his feathers in an ecstasy of delight. After six weeks of dry weather he was evidently feeling the need of a bath, and here was an ideal opportunity to wash and be clean.

Approaching a little nearer and taking better aim, I focused such a shower upon him that the branch swayed to and fro, but as the water increased he appeared all the more delighted, flirting his wings and tail and ducking and wriggling his head as if drunk with joy.

Presently I turned the shower aside; but so absorbed was he in the fun that he kept up his gymnastics for some time before he noticed that the water was gone. Then he darted out into the midst of it, only to be swept ruthlessly away as before. Retiring to the tree, he began to drink the shining drops that adhered to the leaves, shooting his tongue into each one with unerring aim.

Then, as if tempting me, he perched upon the nearest twig, moving his faultlessly chiseled head up and down with the knowing air characteristic of hummingbirds when at rest, as much as to say, "I'm ready for some more."

I gave him some more, and for a time he struggled manfully to flap his wings and flirt his tail as usual; but the force and volume of the water proved too great to permit that phase of the luxury, so he kept his wings and tail close furled and clung to the twig, the water running in rivulets from his glossy back.

I was beginning to wonder whether he would be foolish enough to stay there till he drowned, when he fluttered awkwardly away, so waterlogged that he almost dropped to the ground, and could not, despite his best efforts, rise any higher than the clump of brakes into which he disappeared.—Newark Call.

DOG THAT CARRIED A MESSAGE

A writer upon the faithfulness and heroism of dogs tells the following tale of frozen Alaska:

Upon the desolate waste of that inhospitable glacier, the Valdes, which has proved a sepulchre to so many bright hopes and earnest aspirations, last winter a party of prospectors were camped; day after day had the men worked their way, death disputing every foot with them, until it was decided that the main party remain in camp and two of their number, accompanied by a dog, started out to find a trail which would lead away from a veritable death trap of the terrible Valdes glacier.

For days did these two wander, until nature succumbed and they lay down weary and exhausted, to sleep the sleep from which there is no awakening. Their faithful companion clung to them, and the warmth of his body was grateful, as they crouched low with the bitter ice-laden wind howling about them.

Their scanty stock of provisions was well-night exhausted, when one of them suggested sending the dog back to the camp. This was a forlorn hope, but it was the only chance they had. Quickly writing a few words on a leaf torn from a book, they made it fast around his neck, and encouraged him to start back on the trail.

The sagacious animal did not appear to understand, but after repeated efforts they persuaded him to go, and he was soon swallowed up in the snow, the mist and the storm.

Two days and nights passed, during which these men suffered untold agonies. On the evening of the third day, when all hope had gone and they were resigned to their fate, from the drifting and blinding snow bounded their faithful dog, and close behind him came ready hands to minister to their wants.

The remainder of the story is simple. The whole party returned, having abandoned their useless quest, and on the last Topeka going south were two grateful men and a very ordinary looking dog. But "that dog will never want as long as we live," said a grizzled and sunburnt man.—Detroit News-Tribune.

HOW THE LEAVES WORK.

Do any of the little men and women know what a leaf is? No doubt many of them do, for little folk are very wise in these days and learn many delightful things that their fathers and mothers never heard of, but most grown people do not. They know, of course, that the broad, thin green things that grow on plants and make the earth so beautiful are leaves, but they do not know that everything that is not stem or root is a leaf. The petals and stamens and pistils of flowers, the wrappings of buds, tendrils and thorns—when they are not stems in disguise—and even fruits, all these, the botanists tells us, are leaves. The halves of a bean or a nut, as we saw last week, are also leaves, stuffed full of food, and it is the thickened bases of lily and onion leaves that make the bulbs of those plants. Some of these things we can quite easily see for ourselves. If we plant the bean, the two halves soon empty themselves of food, and by the time they have pushed their way out of the earth they look like ordinary leaves. Sometimes among the petals of a flower we find a leaf that has forgotten to put on its best clothes, and very often we can find petals that are only half dressed. Sometimes even the pistil forgets what it is about and grows into a whole branch of green leaves.

The reason the leaves look so different is because they have different things to do. Those that do the eating for the rest of the plant have to be green, because for some reason that scientists have never been able to explain they can only eat when they are filled with the green coloring matter that we call chlorophyl, and they have to be thin and broad, because they cannot eat without sunlight any more than they can without chlorophyl, and because most of their food comes from the air. In order to catch as much air and sunlight as possible, therefore, they spread out the material of which they are composed over as wide a space as possible and cut themselves up into all sorts of complicated and beautiful forms. Fruits and other sorts of leaves do not have to do this, and can grow into round balls if they choose.

Leaves are often called the lungs of trees, but they are not quite that. They are little food factories which run at top speed as long as the sun is shining. Plants have to manufacture their food out of the raw dead materials of earth, water and air. No animal can do this, and so we are all dependent for an existence upon the green leaves.

The food-making of the plants is a very complicated business, but the little folk who have studied chemistry can perhaps understand as much about it as anybody does. The leaves breathe in from the air the carbon dioxide which animals breathe off and which is a poison to them. They separate this into carbon and oxygen, and unite the carbon with the hydrogen and oxygen from the water which the roots send up. The result is starch, and the oxygen that is left is breathed back into the air. Thus the plants purify the air for us, besides making our food. When plants grow in water we can see the life-giving oxygen which they breathe out rising in bubbles to the surface, and when they are very small and float at the surface of the water the bubbles of oxygen become entangled among them and form a frothy, green scum. After making the starch the leaves change it into fluid glucose, so that it can be carried through the plant. When it isn't wanted for immediate use it is changed back into starch again and stored up to feed baby leaves and flowers next spring. Other foods, too, the plants make, using nitrogen partly from the soil and partly from the air—and other materials. Of these nitrogen is the most important, and when the plant has used up all there is in the soil the farmer has to put on fertilizers.

The water that is not needed for the food factory is breathed off through thousands of little openings which are usually found on the lower side of the leaf. These are stomata, which is simply Greek for mouths. These mouths have lips, which close up tightly in dry weather to prevent the water from escaping, and there may be as many as one hundred thousand of them to the square inch. The water that evaporates through the stomata, of course, leaves an empty space, or, as we say in Latin, a vacuum, and, of course, all the little folks know that nature will not tolerate a vacuum. So the water behind the vacuum rushes in to fill it, and then there is another vacuum to be filled, and so all the way down to the roots. That is why the water rises in a plant from the roots to the leaves, and it is for precisely the same reason that water rises in a pump. The leaves are little pumps, then, as well as food factories. They look as if they had nothing in the world to do but bask in the sunlight and play with the summer breezes, but there are no busier things in nature, and life on this planet depends on their industry. If they should go on strike there would soon be no little men or little women left to read this page, and no page for them to read, either.—Elizabeth Cudderidge, in the New York Tribune.

CHILD ATE CUTICURA.

Spread Whole Box of It on Crackers—Not the Least Injury Resulted—Thus Proven Pure and Sweet.

A New York friend of Cuticura writes:

"My three year old son and heir, after being put to bed on a trip across the Atlantic, investigated the stateroom and located a box of graham crackers and a box of Cuticura Ointment. When a search was made for the box, it was found empty and the kid admitted that he had eaten the contents of the entire box spread on the crackers. It cured him of a bad cold and I don't know what else."

No more conclusive evidence could be offered that every ingredient of Cuticura Ointment is absolutely pure, sweet and harmless. If it may be safely eaten by a young child, none but the most beneficial results can be expected to attend its application to even the tenderest skin or youngest infant.

The readers of this paper will be pleased to learn that there is at least one dreaded disease that science has been able to cure in all its stages, and that is Catarrh. Hall's Catarrh Cure is the only positive cure now known to the medical fraternity. Catarrh being a constitutional disease, requires a constitutional treatment. Hall's Catarrh Cure is taken internally, acting directly upon the blood and mucous surfaces of the system, thereby destroying the foundation of the disease, and giving the patient strength by building up the constitution and assisting nature in doing its work. The proprietors have so much faith in its curative powers that they offer One Hundred Dollars for any case that it fails to cure. Send for list of testimonials.

The Disappearing Wife.

A woman in Silesia has been haled into court by her husband because she persisted in growing thin in opposition to his wishes. In his petition for a divorce the Silesian gentleman declared that the lady obtained her husband under false pretenses, for when he married her she was full sized and of ample and generous proportions and he had every reason to believe that she would remain so. When slimness became the fashion, however, she suddenly began fading away in order to wear the latest style of empire gown. She rode horseback three hours each morning, played tennis two hours, and then took long, fat-reducing walks. Complainant further avers that she ate like a bird. How successful was this strenuous pursuit of slenderness may be judged from the fact that in three months' time she had lost thirty-one pounds and a portly husband.

For the hard-hearted Silesian judge granted the captious husband's plea for a divorce and delivered a fiery attack upon the prevailing styles in feminine architecture. He laid down the principle that no lady has a right to fade away without her husband's consent, and he completely disallowed defendant's plea that half a wife is better than none.

The wife is left free to continue her disappearing process as long as she likes. It is hoped that her frugal habits of living will prove useful to her, now that she is deprived of a husband's support.—Success Magazine.

She Couldn't Help It.

"For the love of a man," a Topeka girl wrote, and then took carbolic acid and died. It was the reading of the incident that doctors have agreed was the cause of a certain Atchison woman's serious illness, says the Atchison Globe. She gave a sniff of contempt when she read of a girl who killed herself "for the love of a man," and sniffed so hard that the sniff went in and affected her vital organs. The woman is married, has seven children, works like a farm hand in harvest, though her husband is in good circumstances, and hasn't had an outing in 10 years. Doctors say that this sniffing in contempt is apt to prove serious when a woman sniffs as hard as this woman sniffed. She put in that sniff all the disappointment, all the contempt, all the heartache of 15 years, and the sniff simply shattered her whole system, and displaced half her interior.

Afraid of Ghosts

Many people are afraid of ghosts. Few people are afraid of germs. Yet the ghost is a fancy and the germ is a fact. If the germ could be magnified to a size equal to its terrors it would appear more terrible than any fire-breathing dragon. Germs can't be avoided. They are in the air we breathe, the water we drink.

The germ can only prosper when the condition of the system gives it free scope to establish itself and develop. When there is a deficiency of vital force, languor, restlessness, a sallow cheek, a hollow eye, when the appetite is poor and the sleep is broken, it is time to guard against the germ. You can fortify the body against all germs by the use of Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery. It increases the vital power, cleanses the system of clogging impurities, enriches the blood, puts the stomach and organs of digestion and nutrition in working condition, so that the germ finds no weak or tainted spot in which to breed. "Golden Medical Discovery" contains no alcohol, whisky or habit-forming drugs. All its ingredients printed on its outside wrapper. It is not a secret nostrum but a medicine OF KNOWN COMPOSITION and with a record of 40 years of cures. Accept no substitute—there is nothing "just as good." Ask your neighbors.

Registration Dates, Oct. 4 to 23, inclusive.

The General Land Office at Washington has designated Le Beau and Aberdeen, So. Dak., on the Minneapolis & St. Louis R. R. as registration points.

Le Beau, which is the Missouri River terminus of the Minneapolis & St. Louis R. R., is located on the Missouri River, opposite the Reservation, and is the nearest railroad station to three-fifths of the land.

Aberdeen, the other registration point, is the chief city in northern South Dakota.

These points are reached best by the Iowa Central and Minneapolis & St. Louis R. R. lines.

There will be about 14,000 quarter sections allotted to settlers. The land lays well for farming over most of the reservation. The soil is a light loam and is very fertile. It is similar to that in the counties east of the River, where the land sells from $25.00 to $30.00 per acre. Lignite coal is found over a great part of the reservation.

Who May Secure a Homestead—Under the homestead laws of the United States, any person, male or female who is not the owner of more than 160 acres of land in any state or territory, who is a native born citizen of the United States, or has been naturalized, or declared his intention to become a naturalized citizen of the United States (i. e., one who has taken out his first papers of citizenship), who is over the age of 21 years or the head of a family, may make a homestead entry of not exceeding 160 acres of any of the unoccupied lands of the United States.

PRINCE WORKED IN SLUMS.

"Father Max" Gave Up Royal Luxury to Live Among the Poor.

It will be sad news to many a poor man and woman in London to hear that "Father Max," as he was affectionately known by them, or, to give him his full name, Prince Maximilian of Saxony, has developed consumption and, in order to save his life, has been ordered by the doctors to leave his work and take the open air cure, a London newspaper says. For four years he worked devotedly in one of the poorest parishes of London, this being the scene of his labors after his ordination.

In violent contrast to this were the earliest years of his life. He is a brother of the present King of Saxony and began his career as a lieutenant of the Saxon guards. But court life was thoroughly distasteful to him, being always a serious-minded man and inclined rather to study and meditation than the activities—or worse, the idleness—of mock soldiering. He inherited a deep religious feeling from his mother, the Archduchess Louise Antoinette of Tuscany, and when he turned to the church much was happening at the court of Saxony to disgust and depress him. His brother, King Frederick Augustus, married the unfortunate Archduchess Louise of Austria, whose divorce and subsequent matrimonial affairs occasioned so much scandal, and one can guess how glad the young prince would be to put himself loose from such surroundings.

He, therefore, threw up his commission in the guards and began his studies with a view to entering the Roman Catholic church under Bishop Von Leonard of Bavaria, and was ordained in 1896. When he took up his work in London the late Queen Victoria, although a strong Evangelical, showed her approbation of the life he had chosen by presenting him with a gorgeous set of priestly robes. This is the more remarkable as he was an extremist in his religious views.

In 1901 he was called to the chair of theology in the University of Fribourg, Switzerland, where he has lectured on this subject until this late sad development has put a sudden stop to his work. In 1903 he was made archbishop of Olmutz.

Prince Max is still on the sunny side of 40; he is tall and has an earnest face and a strong, resonant voice which lent much charm to his preaching.

FASHION HINTS

Something that's just housey, and yet not belonging to the wrapper family, is a little hard to find. The house gown shown here is a pretty solution of the problem. Inexpensively developed in silk muslin, it is charming. If a warmer gown is desired, it would be very pretty in one of the fancy challies.

Waste of Material.

In process of time it was observed that the multimillionaire philanthropist had ceased giving costly library buildings to towns and cities.

"Why is this, Mr. Canaggy?" the reporters asked him.

"Young men," he said, "what is the use of building great houses for libraries when all a man needs for an education is five feet of books?"

Whereat they marveled, but they could not answer him.—Chicago Tribune.

Onomatopoetic.

One of the charms of music is that the musically uneducated person does not have to "understand" it. With "imitative" music, however, the case is quite different, and every passage has either an obvious or a thinly concealed meaning. Occasionally it is hard to decipher certain unusual noises, as the following story from Fliegende Blaetter indicates:

The composer had just played his last piece to his friend, the critic.

"Very fine, indeed," said the critic. "But what is that passage which makes the cold chills run down the back?"

"Oh," returned the composer, "that is where the wanderer has the hotel bill brought to him."

Autumn

When all the leaves turn red and gold,
And on the breeze come ridin' down,
And the whitiest clouds the sky can hold
Go sailin' over field and town,

And there's a sort of bluey haze
A-hangin' round the woods and there
The happy song bird's sweetest lays
Come floatin' out upon the air—

The butterflies that always fill
The roads, and flit around the weeds,
The crickets' song that's never still—
The winds a-sailing countless seeds,

The dusk a-sagin' down so low,
The bonfire's smoke upon the air,
And children rakin' leaves to throw
Upon the fire a-blazin' there,

It makes a fellow wish that fall
Would last throughout the whole blamed year;
And there was naught to do, at all
But let the zestful atmosphere

Just fill him up clear to the brim,
Of all the glories he can hold,
That Autumn has in store for him,
When all the leaves turn red and gold.

Chas. Dohner was called home from Oskosh, Wis, last Saturday on account of the serious illness of his wife.

Samuel Keppeler started for El Paso, California, last Thursday where he expects to spend the winter.

Mrs. Kyle has bought the Cramer restaurant at Bryan, and took possession of same last Monday.

The boys are having a great time fishing in the river these fine days.

The L. S. & M. S. are still having trouble with the sink at Mina.

The L. S. & M. S. has been improving things in Edgerton with a new coat of paint.

Wm. Spindler started for his home at Deadwood, South Dakota, last Monday after visiting about two weeks with his parents and other friends in Edgerton.

Ed Killinger was at Toledo last Sunday.

Our football boys were over at Hicksville last Friday afternoon and played with the Hicksville sports. They report the score 10 to 0 in favor of Edgerton, but Hicksville claims 10 to 0 in favor of Hicksville.

J. A. Jinnings attended the K. of P. dedication in Butler last Thursday. He reports a fine time and says that the K. of P. has a home that they can well feel proud of.

Otis Goeltzenleuchter attended the K. of P. dedication at Butler last Thursday.

Reuben Fitzcharles was at Toledo last Sunday.

Otis Goeltzenleuchter was at Spencerville on business last Monday.

R. J. Smith finished his job of grading on the L. S. & M. S. at Air Line Junction last Friday and shipped his horses and tools home last Saturday.

Dana Farnham spent Saturday and Sunday at home with his parents. He is attending college at Fort Wayne.

The foreigners that have been working for A. Bailey on the L. S. & M. S. and living in some box cars on the spur east of Lewis' hay barn for the last three months, all left but six last week. We have not learned if they were going to get a new crew or not.

Mrs. Charles Dohner got up last Saturday morning feeling as good as she ever did in her life, but while getting breakfast she took a dizzy spell and nearly fell to the floor. She lay down on the couch, and not getting better, they phoned for the doctor. She took a severe pain in her head and the only relief was from opiates, but Monday evening about 9 o'clock she passed away. She was about 39 years old and leaves a husband and four daughters to mourn her loss besides a host of friends. Funeral from the house Thursday. Interment in Maplegrove cemetery. In the death of Mrs. Dohner the community has lost a good woman, the church a great worker, she being the superintendent at the time of her death.

Messrs. Ridgill and Burns

Thousands of people have stomach trouble, constipation, indigestion, sick headache, etc., and don't know what to do for it. Perhaps the experience of Mr. Ridgill, postmaster at Bruceville, Tex., and Mr. Burns, Wabash R. R. engineer, Bement Ill., will suggest a method. Both of these men take pleasure in saying that they cured themselves with Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin. It is absolutely guaranteed to do what is claimed, and if you want to try it before buying, send your address for a free bottle to Pepsin Syrup Co., 119 Caldwell Bldg., Monticello, Ill. It is sold by all druggists at 50c and $1 a bottle. 39-1m

Spencerville

Mrs. Gertrude Wasson is on the sick list, but is better at this writing. She is under the care of Dr. Shook, of Spencerville.

Last Friday, Velma, daughter, of Jerry Davis, was taken to the hospital at Fort Wayne for an operation. We hear that her case is quite serious.

James Farner ate dinner with his sister, Mrs. John Means, Sunday.

Calvin Stoffer and family of Kansas are here visiting friends in this vicinity at present.

Everett Walker, wife and daughter, Grace, of Hicksville, Mrs. Lucy Ann Fairfield, of Spencerville, and Thomas Phillips and wife, of Auburn, were the guests of S. M. High and wife Sunday.

Mrs. Julia Means was the guest of her parents at Spencerville Sunday.

Lewis Wasson is still running his threshing machine. This has been a long season for him.

Samuel Watson is hauling timber to build a barn on his farm on Mink street.

We were shown a letter the other day written by the Missing Apple Co., of Clayton, Ill., showing very plainly that some agents claiming to sell that apple are not selling it, they have but one agent in this vicinity and that is John Means. He has the exclusive right. It is copyright No. 31993, and the company says very emphatically that they will prosecute anyone selling it without authority. John Means is also selling a lot of trees for the Michigan nursery of Monroe. John is meeting with great success in these parts.

Mr. and Mrs. John Rager spent Sunday with Milton Anthony and family.

James Neidic and son were at Auburn Tuesday with a load of hogs.

Mr. and Mrs. Cleve Rose entertained at dinner Sunday, Freeman Fifer and wife and Miss Olive Fifer.

Mr. and Mrs. John Huntington entertained last Sunday F. A. Huntington and family and Frank Teutsch and family.

Sherman Kepler was working last week for his brother Jay.

Mr. and Mrs. Bert Rose were visitors at Hamilton last Sunday.

There will be preching at Jerusalem next Sunday evening.

Miss Olive Fifer is visiting with friends in this neighborhood at present

Mr. John Dove, who has been working on the railroad has a lay off for the present.

Bert Rose has a very sore eye, caused by being struck with a board, while loading hogs.

Stafford and East Wilmington

Lately Mrs. Eberly has been reported worse again. Her age is against complete recovery it seems.

Mrs. Wesley Wyckoff is still quite poorly and unable to get up and stand on her feet.

Many farmers are working out their road taxes this week.

The Lake Shore railroad has the great sum of $510.73 of road tax in Stafford township that can be worked out. The job, we hear, has been let and sub-let and is being worked out in the north part of the township.

Mrs. Gibson, formerly Miss Margaret Wyckoff, has moved to Auburn where she has purchased property for a home.

Miss Laura DeVinney is again teaching school at Lima, Ind. This, we think, makes her third year of school work at Lima.

Phillip Ramsey is reported very ill with but little chance for recovery. It is said that his age is 87 years, and if so he is perhaps the oldest man in the township.

C. A. DeVinney, Samuel Adams and others are circulating petitions for an election under the local option law.

Wm. Ball and others recently made a visit to Alabama. They report some very fine land and much that is very poor.

Henry Gunsenhouser and wife returned home Monday from an extended visit with relatives in Michigan.

After being ill and unable to work for about ten days George Gunsenhouser is at work again, but he says he has to keep on taking medicine for a while yet.

Many farmers are much opposed to the building of a new court house in this county in the near future. They say the old court house, kept in good repair and improved, would be good enough for forty or fifty years yet. They also censure the county commissioners for going about, at public expense, for the purpose of selecting a design for a new building. If they were candidates now many would not vote for them who gave them hearty support at the last election.

William G. Kist, one of the proprietors of the Garrett Daily Press, has begun a suit in circuit court in which he prays for a legal separation from his wife, Hattie Kist. The complaint sets forth the fact that the parties were married May 25, 1896, and lived together until January 24, 1905, the defendant without cause or justification, against the will of the plaintiff, wholly abandoned him and has not since returned. He therefore deems himself worthy of a decree. It is not thought that the defendant will appear and the divorce will probably be granted by default.

Do not fail to hear Rev. Dr. Sigler at the Methodist church next Sunday morning. He will speak also on Friday and Saturday evenings. He has spent over a year in Indiana preaching and giving special addresses on tithing.

The following amusing conversation was overheard on a busy thorourghfare on State St., Chicago, recently, the speakers being three poorly dressed news boys. It was evident to the observer that he had missed the first part of an entertaining and instructive chat, in which two of the boys were regaling the third, with a description of a soul stirring event. The two were in the midst of a huge conflagration, seemingly, as I heard how the villian stole the little girl, the little lad's eyes were like saucers in his excitement. There was a momentary silence which one of the boys broke by exclaiming, "And togs, hully gee, Porky, youse ought to see them togs. Why, dat kid has got all the Queen's knocked clean to Xero for togs." At this the tall boy with red hair endeavored to add to the silent one's education by going into details, "An' say, and dey had real gold and silver on dere clothes. And der main lady had a feather on a bonnet "Dat long" indicating a distance of about 4 feet. This was too much for the lad with black eyes and he shifted his weight to the other foot and set his hat more firmly over his left ear and exclaimed in a very superior manner, "Aw dat ain't nothin. Wot did yer tink of dat soap sudsy dress wot the little girl wore in the second act? O, say, Porkey it was all pink silk 'cause I heard a dame say so and it had another dress over it wot looked like soap suds, and say Porkey she looked for all just like a big dish of strawberry ice cream." I will admit my curiosity was consuming me and I was just about to ask where this wonder could be found when he of the black eyes said, "And dat man that plays the girl's real father ain't no dub either" and I know that he referred to Harry Shannon's production of "The Banker's Child" which is to be here Nov. 1st and promises to be one of the best comedy dramas of the season.

Can't Learn in School

When the stomach is out of order or the bowels constipated, a feeling of drowsiness and inactivity comes over the body. The Brain won't think, and the body won't work. If it is a child who suffers in this way, it naturally can't learn well in school, as it has no inclination for study. Give the child a dose of Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin and you will soon find it wonderfully improved and ultimately cured. It is guaranteed to do what is claimed, and if you want to try it before buying, send your address for a free sample bottle to Pepsin Syrup Co., 119 Caldwell Bldg., Monticello, Ill. LETTER FROM SAN FRANCISCO

San Francisco, Cal., Oct. 21, '09.

Dear Mother—No doubt by this time you think I am a fine son for not answering your letter before. I got your letter on our arrival here from Seattle, the 12th. Upon our arrival here for portola week I was put upon the portola committee to help to the entertainment of the foreign Blue Jackets.

I have been kept pretty busy since. Have been ashore the biggest part of the time making arrangements for their reception. There was one man from each ship on the committee. We gave a big smoker in their honor last night to 2,000 men. It was a swell affair. When we met the committee ashore they wanted to give the affair and charge all enlisted admission. Why some of the foreign sailors do not receive per month what they wanted to charge, so us navy men told them there was nothing doing. We went and got a subscription from each ship and gave it ourselves.

I got Mary's letter yesterday and was sorry to hear of your being worse. Hope you are better by this time. You want to take care of yourself. Mary said Harry was at home. How did he like the west? Hope he is well.

We leave here for Madgalena bay on Nov. 1, for our semi annual battle practice, getting ten hits out of a possible twelve at 2,000 yards. I have been promoted since last writing. I am a gunner's mate now. Like the work fine. Guess I will make good at it.

Well, mamma, I must close for it is getting late. Give my regards to all. Love to you and the family. I am

Your son,
ARTHUR LATSON.

In the Local Court

A hard fought legal battle was held in Squire Webster's court Monday and Tuesday. W. H. Oberlin was plaintiff in the suit and Vern Haywood defendant, Mr. Oberlin alleging that Mr. Heywood, who conducted a moving picture show here some weeks, had failed to come up to his contract, the substance of the alleged contract being that said Haywood was to occupy his store room for a certain length of time for which he was to pay Mr. Oberlin $25 per month. The show was moved into another building and the keys returned to the owner of the building.

E. B. Dunten represented the defendant and Frank A. Brink acted in behalf of the plaintiff. About eight hours were consumed in the examining of witnesses and the arguments of the attorneys. The jury handed in a verdict in favor of the plaintiff after a few minutes deliberation. The jurors were Tode Latson, Amos Snyder, Si Simon, Wm. Mutzfeld and Wm. Elden. The jury was very attentive all through the trial, occasionally nodding their approval as the proceedings advanced, with a yawn now and then thrown in. Tode stretched his massive form over two chairs and occasionally seemed lost in thought (perhaps a doze) while Si puffed complacently away at a Chas. Denby, while Snyder, Elden and Mutzfeld now and then struck viciously at the flies which dared to interrupt the silence of the court room with their humming.

The attorneys clashed several times on points of law which were decided by the court as he looked wise and stroked his long beard. Said plaintiff received judgment for one month's rent. ($25.00) It is said the dose is to be repeated each month until the 1st of February.

MOFFETT CANNOT BE "KNOCKED" WHERE KNOWN

Former Editor Discovered Blind Tiger in Dry County---May Be Burned at the Stake

A great deal of space is being devoted to E. D. Moffett who refused to answer questions before the DeKalb county grand jury. It will take more than the exaggerated and distorted accounts of the incident by the discredited anti-saloon grafters of Hartford City to discredit Mr. Moffett in Hartford City, where he is honored and respected by the best citizens and even by many of those who do not agree with him on prohibition. Mr. Moffett commands the respect of everyone who knows him and if his traducers, either here or in DeKalb county, bore a reputation half as good their attacks might have more weight The editor of the local dry rag refused to give information to the Blackford county grand jury, yet he abuses Mr. Moffett for doing the same thing. In writing to a friend here Mr. Moffett says:

"I didn't buy nor try to buy whiskey or liquor for anyone, nor was I charged with so doing. I was a witness. I am satisfied with the part I took."

The friends of the blind tiger always want to abuse those who favor the licensed saloon. Most of them being sneaks favor the sneaks' illegal saloon. —Hartford City Times.

FOR BEST SPELLERS IN DEKALB COUNTY

Hon. Charles Eckhart Has Offered $25 in Gold to Winners

County Superintendent H. E. Coe has sent a letter, a copy of which follows herewith, to all of the school teachers in the county, conveying the information that Hon. Charles Eckhart, of Auburn, will give $25 in gold for the best speller. The letter is self-explanatory and follows:

My Dear Teachers—The Hon. Chas. Eckhart, always the champion of worthy causes, has kindly made us the following offer:

He offers to the pupil of the public school who will prove himself by some sort of contest, to be the best speller of the county, $25 in gold.

In order to properly appreciate this kind offer so generously made, we have devised the following plans that we may ascertain by proper contest who is the best speller.

Each school, except the high school in a corporation, shall by some contest determine the three best spellers in that particular school or room and these shall meet at some designated place in the corporation in which the schools are located and under the management and direction of the teachers and trustee of that corporation spell and determine the three best spellers of that particular corporation.

These then in turn will meet at some place yet to be named in Auburn, on the first Saturday in March, 1910, and determine the best speller of the county. That person shall receive the $25 in gold. All contestants must be pupils now attending the public schools below the high school.

In all these contests the words in the present spelling book used in the public school will be pronounced. If, however, in the last contest more than one pupil be found who can spell all the words in the spelling book, then in order to decide the contest words from any of the text books in the public schools may be pronounced.

This is a chance for some one not only to win $25 in gold, but also a lasting honor. To be a good speller is a credit in any business.

Respectfully,
H. E. COE, County Supt.

Brotherhood Debate

The Brotherhood will hold a meeting at the Methodist church next Monday night. The following question will be debated:

Resolved that Dr. Cook's claims regarding the discovery of the north pole are better than those of Peary. Those who will speak on the affirmative are Rev. E. F. Albertson, Thomas Rudd, E. B. Dunten. Negative: Prof. Austin, Dr. Shumaker, Prof. Endicott. The president, Prof. Bean will preside and select three judges.

This meeting promises to be one of unusual interest. The public invited. Admission free. Come and help decide the Cook-Peary controversy.

EDITOR MOFFATT BEFORE THE COURT

AUBURN, Oct. 26—E. D. Moffatt, the Hartford City man who came to Waterloo to edit Ab Kelley's newspaper, has met his Waterloo. He was called before the grand jury last week, and hauled over the coals of fire in the grand jury room. It appears that the grane jury had been given some "tips" which made them good for a very rigid examination of Mr. Moffatt, and when Moffatt tried to fool with the grand jury and evade their questions the "lawyer-editor" was given to understand that they knew he was perjuring himself and that they had sufficient evidence to make good their examination of the witness. Moffatt's memory failed, and all he could say was that he did "not remember."

The grand jury then ordered Mr. Moffatt before Judge Bratton where he deliberately refuted statements he made before the grand jury but a few moments before.

It is the blind tiger proposition that the grand jury was after, and they evidently had good reason to believe that Moffatt knew where the tiger was kept and probably more than that. It is indeed a grave offense for anyone to make false statements before a grand jury or court, and further more to refuse to answer a question to the grand jury is perjury and is difficult to meet when the law of the court is brought to bear.

Mr. Moffatt was given a grilling in open court by Judge Bratton and Prosecutor Smith, that he will never forget and it was witnessed by a large audience of spectators. The examination brought back his memory very vividly.

READY FOR CROWDS

All Chicago Prepared to Entertain the Visitors to Land Exposition.

Never Such an Interest in Land and Irrigation Before—All Parts of the Country Responding to the Call to the Great Land Rally.

When the Chicago Tribune first proposed the Land and Irrigation Exposition the public little realized the furor it would create throughout the country. The emissaries of the exposition management have gone into every western state and aroused an interest that will have its climax on the opening day of the coming show.

Other representatives were sent throughout the east and south, calling to this great convocation everyone who is interested in land development.

The work has gone on and on with such energy and united effort that the coming event will be one of the greatest in Chicago since the Columbian exposition in 1893.

Approximately half a million dollars will be expended on this magnificent display of western and southern products and the marvelous possibilities in the states of the west and south.

Never has an exposition been undertaken in Chicago where the entire scheme of installation has been planned on such a harmonious scale. The great Coliseum will be a thing of beauty throughout its vast interior. The decorations will be true to the spirit of the whole enterprise. Coming as this exposition does at the time of the International Live Stock Show, Nov. 20 to Dec. 4, Chicago will offer, as theatrical people express it, a "double bill" to the people of the country. It is the greatest "combined show" of the period.

All the railroads centering in Chicago, and all of their connections at distant points have prepared for a large traffic in view of the widespread interest which this exposition has created.

Chicago is unquestionably the greatest land center in America. All of the large companies which are developing the country have their headquarters here, and it is entirely fitting that Chicago should take the lead in planning and carrying out an exposition on the grand scale which is now reaching a stage of completion. There will be no disappointment for the coming visitor. The vastness of our land interests will amaze those who consider themselves familiar with this nation's development.

The orchards of the northwest and the central mountain districts; the great stock ranches of Montana and other states; the orange groves and peach orchards of California; the rich valley lands of Arizona where all subtropical fruits grow in such wonderful abundance; the great coastal plains of Texas and Louisiana with their vast sugar and rice plantations, will all be represented in the exhibits, and the homeseeker may have a choice of countless opportunities which these various regions offer.

The United States government is lending its aid to this enterprise and will have numerous exhibits. The great work of drainage and irrigation and the equally important work of soil survey and crop production will all be in charge of experts who will give first-hand information to every inquirer. It will be a splendid school for everyone who is at all interested in the great land movement of the present day.

The invitation to attend this exposition is extended to everyone by Chicago, and by the Tribune management, to whose energies and financial support the country is indebted for this magnificent enterprise.

CHICAGO'S BIG LAND BANQUET

Distinguished Men from Many States Will Attend the Land and Irrigation Exposition, and Be Royally Entertained.

A feature of the Land and Irrigation Exposition, to be held in Chicago, Nov 20 to Dec. 4, will be a banquet to distinguished men who have shown a marked interest in irrigation and other forms of land development. Among those invited to this affair are President Taft and cabinet; governors of many states, particularly those of the west and southwest; Hon. James J Hill, and other distinguished railroad men; Arthur Stillwell, of Kansas City Mo.; E. B. Ripley, of the Santa Fe railroad; Edwin Hawley B. F. Yoakum, George Gould, William K. Vanderbilt, C. K. G. Billings, Gage E. Tarbell, J. Pierpont Morgan, John D Rockefeller F. H. Newell of the reclamation service, Gifford Pinchot, of the forestry service, Dr. W. J. McGee and many others.

Not in many years has there been such a feeling of enthusiasm over the development of our country's resources as at the present time. Scientists, financiers and men of all walks of life are turning to the land as the source of all our supplies and as affording a means of outdoor life and health. The great exposition in Chicago, under the auspices of the Chicago Tribune, will afford the opportunity for a great gathering of the forces that are doing so much for the irrigation and reclamation of what formerly were considered our waste lands.

Jack Johnson is inviting all explorers to find that weak spot.

In New Guinea, as the London Chronicle reminds us, the women propose. And to anybody who has seen them the reason is clear.

There is comfort and joy in the thought that we are to have a good apple yield this year. Otherwise we might have to eat Ben Davises.

By this time next year, people will frequent the housetops and take their evening recreation by watching aeronauts trying to hog the aerial lanes.

Fortunately for their records, neither explorer fished through a hole in the ice at the Pole and caught a good string, while the biggest one got away.

Funny to hear those aviators kicking about the condition of the aviation grounds, isn't it? You'd think that all they'd want would be a large bunch of nice smooth air.

When Peary and his party reached the Pole the Eskimos cried out: "Ting neigh, timah ketisher." This must have been disappointing to those who expected them to yell, "Excelsior."

Eskimo wives and mothers, it is said, never suffer from the ailments that afflict the matrons of a higher civilization. But it is no more than fair that there should be some compensation for being an Eskimo wife.

San Francisco is getting ready to celebrate the discovery of San Francisco Bay. For the benefit of those who have forgotten, it may be mentioned that San Francisco Bay was discovered by Gaspar de Portola, who doesn't seem to have had a single Eskimo in his party.

A test case is to be made in the New York courts as to what criminal statute is violated by the offense technically known as "talking back" to the police, and whether arrest and punishment in the matter are justified by the law. The question of illegal arrest is really a serious one, as the whole matter of personal liberty, upon which the principles of this government are founded, is involved.

The word "lobbyist" has generally been used, with good reason, as a term of reproach, yet it is well to remember that one may have commendable reasons for approaching legislators and trying to influence their deeds. In Washington, during the last session of Congress, a woman was spoken of as "one of the most aggressive lobbyists ever seen at the Capital." She was acting, however, merely as the representative of California clubwomen, and her mission, happily successful, was to help insure the preservation of the giant redwoods, which are one of the glories of the state.

Meat has been officially introduced as a part of the Japanese army diet, and, as a result, the Japanese board of agriculture has sent a commission abroad to investigate and take steps for introducing the breeding of cattle in Japan. One reason for the change of diet is to avert a repetition of the scourge of beri-beri which sapped the strength of the army during the Russian war, and was said to have been due to the rice diet, and another purpose is to add to the stature of the race by a general introduction of meat eating. Here in the Occident there is an increasing conviction that the meat diet has its penalties as well as its benefits.

A recent visitor to one of the largest of American cities stated that it was not the subways nor the tall buildings that impressed him so much, as the great number of prosperous, well-kept, good-looking old men. "They are," he said, "seen on the streets by the thousand, carefully dressed, leisurely in movement, yet apparently actively concerned with affairs. It is a stronger indication to me of the accumulated wealth, of the established success of the city, than anything else I have seen." These old men are splendid specimens. The game of life interests them and they have the good sense to keep actively employed in it rather than to confine themselves to their homes or to eat their hearts out in their own inactivity. Lowell said of Emerson that he "has that privilege of soul which abolishes the calendar and presents him to us always the unwasted contemporary of his own prime." Whitman foresaw for America a race "of splendid and savage old men." We are accustomed to hear "the hurry of business life" decried and American ideals of life unfavorably contrasted with European. But the results in many cases are not so bad, after all. Look at our splendid and effective old men.

Thus goes the old familiar song: "How dear to my heart are the scenes of my childhood." On second thought, however, one may interpose an exception or two. Let the memory go back to the "parlor." In the recollections of childhood it does not figure as one of the popular home institutions. There was something sacrosanct about it that did not appeal to boys at least, and the girls didn't seem to give it much appreciation until Horace and Arthur accumulated sufficient courage to inaugurate the custom of calling around on Sunday afternoons, sitting on those frail and artistic Louis XIV. chairs and assuming the joyful expression of slaves on the block while passing stereotyped compliments upon photographs in the family album, many of which pictured numerous freaks of the genealogical tree. Ed Howe, in his Atchison Globe, quoting an architectural authority, says that the American parlor, as an institution of the home, or adjacent thereto, is passing, adding: "That word 'adjacent' is used advisedly, and with a distinct recollection of some parlors all have seen. In the house they were, of course, but they were far enough from the home; perhaps adjacent is a little too close, since they remained a dungeon except on grand occasions like funerals, or weddings, or entertaining the presiding elder. So the parlor's doom will leave no aching void. It was something in the void itself, when most of an institution; devoid at least of comfort or cheer, of sunshine or fresh air. And the chairs ranged about in such excellent order, added to the somber light that filtered through shades and shutter which strove to shut it out, made of it a nice, grim death chamber, which purpose it served frequently, and better than the others, being better suited to the purpose."

TALKS ON ADVERTISING

There's No Other Way.

The old adage that "Money makes the mare go," has a counterpart in the truism that advertising creates and holds business. What man of ordinary common sense engaged in business in this day and generation would think, or have the right to think, of success without liberal publicity through that best of all advertising mediums, the local paper? Sacred history records that "there is a time for all things," and when that truthful sentence was penned if it was not meant that advertising should be perennial there was a lack of foresight that his since been made manifest.

The smallest merchant in the smallest town, even though he may be the sole occupant of the field, will soon find there is no field whatever if the matter of spreading printer's ink is overlooked or ignored. Trade that by right should come to him will be diverted in the direction of a rival town, where the spirit of enterprise above and beyond all takes into consideration the power of the press as a distributor of information that the public desires to know before parting with their dollars, that they may be placed where they will do the most good.

Without advertising there is no sure thing to success. It has been demonstrated by piles of musty goods on dusty shelves, by out-of-date fabrics that nobody wants at any price, and culminates in a putting up of the blinds and a pulling down of the curtains, no more to be taken down or raised up.

If we are in business there are some things incurring expense and labor and effort that may be put aside temporarily if not permanently, but advertising, never! That must go on if we want to go on ourselves with successful business pursuits.—Exchange.

Sparrows Served as Woodcock.

Friends of State Senator Sterling R. Catlin, of this city, who attended a dinner he gave the other night, are now wishing they had not accepted, for a joke he played upon them became public property. The main course at the dinner was named as woodcock, and the guests remarked how small and tender they were.

It was noticed that Senator Catlin did not seem to eat much of his, and to-day the guests learned why, for, as a joke, he had them served with common sparrow instead of woodcock.—Wilkesbarre dispatch to New York American.

Long Lived Fish.

Fishes, especially the larger species, live a very long time. According to Bacon, eels live fifty years. Carp have been known to exist at least 150 years, while dolphins, sturgeons and sharks live more than a century and attain a huge size.

The Cylinder Printing Press.

In 1814 Frederick Koenig invented the cylinder press in London. It was used here first in 1827. Koenig invented it to the order of Walter of the London Times, the world's greatest newspaper in those days.

Nickel Steel.

At high temperatures the breaking strength of nickel steel is higher than that of welded iron, and this applies in a still greater degree to the elastic limit.

The water boundaries of France are as follows: Mediterranean sea coast, 395 miles; North sea, strait of Dover and English channel, 572 miles; Atlantic ocean, 584 miles.

The Zuyder Zee.

The Zuyder Zee was formed by an inroad of the sea, which broke down the protecting sand dunes.

POLITICS OF THE DAY

The War Among Republicans.

It was under the lash of a cruel necessity that President Taft, speaking for "party solidarity," extolled the Payne tariff and assailed the Republican insurgent Senators and Representatives of the middle West. His Winona speech was, and was intended to be, the signal for a civil war within the Republican party, the first rallying bugles of which were already sounding.

The President's attack upon the insurgents was made deliberately. His intention to make it was announced from Beverly several weeks before he started on his tour. Disregarding the counsel of his more conservative Republican advisers in the East, Mr. Taft, after full consideration, aligned himself with that element of his party which tolerates no revolt against the policy of monopoly protection.

That faction of the Republican party would rather see a Democrat in Congress than a Republican who stands for the Western demand that "every schedule which shelters a monopoly" be cut out of the tariff. The insurgent Senators whose terms expire in 1911 and all of the insurgent Representatives have the best of reasons for interpreting the Winona speech to mean that all the influence of the administration and of the Aldrich-Cannon faction of the party will be used against them in the elections of next year.

The absence from Winona of every member of the Minnesota delegation in Congress except Representative Tawney, the merely formal courtesies exchanged between the President and the Minnesota Senators at St. Paul and the politely formal breakfast given the President by Senator Cummins at Des Moines show plainly enough that Mr. Taft was received in those states only as President of the United States and not as the leader of his party.

The threat that notice may be served by the "regulars" in Kansas on Senator Bristow, Representative Murdock and Governor Stubbs to betake themselves to the Democratic party, and the fight preparing against Senator La Follette in Wisconsin indicate that the line of compromise has been hopelessly left behind. The insurgents burned their bridges behind them when they voted against the Payne bill and must now fight for their lives.

By act and word the President decrees that there is not room in the Republican party for any man who does not agree with him that the Payne tariff is the best ever made. The Winona speech was public proclamation that the Democratic party offers the only hope for escape from the greed of monopoly tariff taxation.—St. Louis Republic.

Tax on the Breakfast Table.

When a Republican Congress, shortly after the Civil War, put coffee and tea on the free list as a pretext for retaining or increasing protective tariff taxes on articles produced in this country, a great hurrah was made about the "Free Breakfast Table" for the workingman.

A reader of the St. Louis Republic, who seemingly has been studying the rising cost of living and wants to know what the tariff makers have done to his breakfast table, goes far enough into ancient history to ask what was the tax on refined sugar in the McKinley tariff of 1890.

It was half a cent a pound and raw sugar was on the free list. The American refiner was protected to the extent of just half a cent a pound. It will be remembered that in the Congressional elections held less than a month after the McKinley tariff was signed by President Harrison the Republicans were overwhelmed by a landslide of votes.

The Dingley tariff of 1897 increased the tariff on refined sugars nearly fourfold over the McKinley rate, making it 1 cent and ninety-five hundredths of a cent—in round numbers, 2 cents a pound. At the same time a tariff tax of ninety-five hundredths of a cent a pound was placed on raw sugars. This gave the American refiner a net margin of protection of exactly 1 cent a pound, just twice the protection they received in the McKinley act.

The Payne tariff retains practically the Dingley rate on raw sugars and makes the rate on refined sugars 1 cent and ninety-one hundredths of a cent, which is an infinitesimal reduction from the Dingley rate. But the maximum of 25 per cent is to be added on importations of refined sugars from countries which do not treat us as a "most favored nation" commercially—Germany, with its beet sugar, probably included.

The Republic's inquiring reader will easily cipher it out for himself that the Payne tariff taxes the sugar on his breakfast table almost exactly four times as much as the McKinley tariff did.

Taft and Aldrich.

It was hardly necessary for President Taft to make public expression of his confidence in Senator Aldrich, as the monetary savior of the United States, as well as the fountain head of tariff wisdom.

Taft did not wait to have the new tariff bill brought to him for his signature. He was at the capitol, with pen in hand, while the conference committee was putting the final touches on the new tariff measure. He signed it.

The country needs no other evidence that the views of Aldrich are the views of Taft. The President's signature made the measure an Aldrich-Taft one. As such it has been launched and as such it will be criticised.

It was Aldrich who had President Taft's ear at Beverly, the summer capital, when other statesmen of the first rank sought a hearing in vain. It is Aldrich, according to Mr. Taft's own prediction, who is slated to lift the nation from its financial morass and give it smooth sailing.

President Taft will doubtless reiterate this belief on his Western tour. The reception of these predictions may embarrass him. The prestige of the presidential office is one thing, but the role of apologist for Aldrich is another.

Mr. Taft will find, before his Western tour is far along that the people who elected him President have radically different views on the nation's tariff needs than those held by the New England group of mill bosses which are imbedded in the Aldrich-Taft bill.

The Aldrich-Taft alliance will not impress the west favorably.—Chicago Journal.

Dodging the Main Issue.

President Taft lays much stress upon side issues in his western discussions of the tariff problem. He tells the western farmers that the country will gain immensely from the tax on corporations. He points with pride to the new tariff commission, which will furnish a scientific base for future tariff adjustments.

What his western hearers really wish Mr. Taft to explain is why he signed a tariff law that admittedly violates the Republican party's solemn ante-election pledges. Mr. Taft admits that the woolen schedule is a direct violation of these pledges. But his only answer to the main question is that if he had vetoed the bill in its entirety he would have endangered the "solidarity" of the Republican party.

This might be considered an argument if President Taft's hearers were exclusively partisan Republicans. Even then it would be a lame apology. For we cannot assume that the Republican party lacks patriots or that a Republican President would not play better politics by keeping his pledges.

The main issue is still written large throughout the West. If President Taft does not actually evade it, his explanations hardly measure up to an adequate standard.

The West would like to know why it must pay tribute indefinitely to Eastern mill bosses. And President Taft will not, or cannot, tell.

How Bank Guaranty Works.

An Oklahoma trust company with deposits of more than $3,000,000 failed. Next day the doors were opened, and the concern's available cash and the bank deposit guaranty fund were piled on the counters ready to pay depositors in full. Fewer than 100 were waiting for their money when the doors opened, and there was no excitement.

How different from what would occur should a Chicago bank with an equal sum on deposit be forced to close. Such a failure would cause great excitement, mobs of depositors would gather about the bank, all the bank's cash would be tied up, and depositors of business accounts would suffer inconvenience and loss even if they eventually received their money in full. In fact, a sizable panic, and, in ticklish financial seasons, trouble of serious order would ensue.

Insurance of bank deposits is just as simple as insuring a barn, and just as good business policy. Republican grand dukes and their banking friends may oppose it, but the day will come when every dollar on deposit in every bank and trust company in this country will be guaranteed the depositor.—Chicago Journal.

JUST AS HEAVY AS EVER.

MEMORIES OF THE WAR

Sentenced to Be Shot.

Farmer Owen's son had been found asleep when doing sentinel duty, and was sentenced to be shot. A telegram had been received by his father, saying that the sentence would be carried out in twenty-four hours. Mr. Allan, the minister, called to comfort the sorrowing family. During his visit a letter arrived. Blossom, the farmer's little daughter, opened the door and received it. "It is from him," was all she said, as she handed it to the minister, who opened it, and read as follows:

"Dear Father—When this reaches you I will be in eternity. I am going to write you all about it. You know I promised Jimmy Carr's mother I would look after her boy, and when he fell sick I did all I could for him. He was not strong when ordered back into the ranks, and the day before that night I carried all his luggage, besides my own, on our march. If I had not lent him an arm now and then, he would have dropped by the way. I was tired out when we went into camp, and then it was Jimmy's turn to be sentry, and I would take his place, but I was too tired, father. I could not have kept awake though a gun had been pointed at my head; but I did not know it until—well—until it was too late.

"They tell me to-day that I have a short reprieve—time to write to you, our good Colonel says; forgive him, father, he only does his duty; he would gladly save me if he could. And do not lay my death up against Jimmy. The poor boy is broken-hearted, and does nothing but beg and entreat them to let him die in my stead.

"I can't bear to think of mother and Blossom. To-night I shall see the cows all coming home from pasture, and precious little Blossom standing waiting for me; but—I shall never—never—come. God bless you all. Forgive your poor Bennie."

Late that night a little figure glided down the footpath toward the railway station. The guard, as he reached down to lift her into the carriage, wondered at the tear-stained little face that was upturned toward the dim old lantern he held in his hand.

A few questions and ready answers told him all, and no father could have cared more tenderly for his only child than he for little Blossom. She was on her way to Washington to ask President Lincoln for her brother's life, and had brought Bennie's letter with her. Next morning they reached New York, and the guard hurried her on to Washington. Every minute, now, might be the means of saving her brother's life.

The President had just seated himself to his evening's task, when the door softly opened and Blossom, with downcast eyes and folded hands, stood before him.

"Well, my child," he said, in his pleasant, cheerful tones, "what do you want?"

"Bennie's life, please, sir," faltered Blossom.

"Bennie! Who is Bennie?"

"My brother, sir. They are going to shoot him for sleeping at his post."

"Oh, yes, I remember. It was a fatal sleep. You see, child, it was a time of special danger. Thousands of lives might have been lost by his negligence."

"So my father said," replied Blossom, gravely. "But poor Bennie was so tired, sir, and Jimmy was so weak. He did the work for two, sir, and it was Jimmy's night, not his; but Jimmy was too tired, and Bennie never thought about himself, that he was tired, too."

"What is this you say, child? Come here; I do not understand."

Blossom went to him. He put his hand on her shoulder and turned up the pale, anxious face toward his. How tall he seemed! And he was President of the United States, too. A dim thought of this kind passed for a moment through Blossom's mind; but she told her simple, straightforward story, and handed Bennie's letter to Mr. Lincoln to read.

He read it carefully, then, taking up his pen, he wrote a few hasty lines and rang his bell. Blossom heard his order given: "Send this dispatch at once." The President then turned to the girl, and said: "Go home, my child, and tell your father, who can approve his country's sentence, even when it takes the life of a child like that, that Abraham Lincoln thinks that life far too precious to be lost. Go back, or—wait until to-morrow; Bennie will need a change after he has so bravely faced death. He shall go with you."

"God bless you, sir!" said Blossom.

Two days after this interview the young soldier came to the White House with his little sister. He was called into the President's private room, and a strap was fastened on his shoulder. Mr. Lincoln then said: "The soldier that could carry a sick comrade's baggage, and die for the act so uncomplainingly, deserves well of his country."

Then Bennie and Blossom took their way to their Green mountain home. A crowd gathered at the railway station to welcome them back; and, as Farmer Owen's hand grasped that of his boy tears flowed down his cheeks, and he was heard to say, fervently: "The Lord be praised."

Tyler (of Michigan).

Ah! but that was in the summer of '61, says a Springfield Republican contributor, and we could smile at the wants of wounded men then. Later on came pathetic scenes at which we did not smile—one when Tyler, of Michigan, was brought in, shot through both knees while gathering wood for a campfire. The surgeon, trying to save both limbs, waited too long till blood poisoning occurred, and one sorrowful day the nurse found the usually cheerful fellow crying like a child at the decision of the surgeon just made known to him.

"My leg has to be amputated tomorrow. It wish it could be done to-day if it has got to come off." And then the thought of going home crippled—it was almost better not to go home at all. "But you'll stay by me, won't you?"

And on the promise given in response to this he relied. The next day stretched upon the rude amputating table, he looked about for the nurse, and taking her hand said he was ready, saying, "now let me go to sleep" and so seemed content till the blessed chloroform deadened all thought or care.

Though the operation was successful and all the first conditions good, a secondary hemorrhage occurred after the first dressing and then we could only sit by the poor fellow while his life ebbed away and the day came for this soldier to die for his country without sight of battle or shout of victory.

The Army Overcoat.

He was idle as a boy, he was shiftless as a youth;
He was slovenly in dress, and his manners were uncouth.
The neighbors looked their scorn when they saw him passing by;
His father used to scold, and his mother used to sigh;
But he volunteered the day he was old enough to vote,
And they hardly knew the fellow in his army overcoat.

For he braced his lazy shoulders with a military air,
His aimless face grew firmer; said the neighbors: "I declare!"
His father took his hand, his mother beamed her pride,
The winter day he marched away, a foolish maiden cried.
Full fifty folks forgot their sneers, full fifty roughly smote
With friendly slap the back that wore the army overcoat.

He sent his parents letters they were long in making out;
He was faithful as a sentry, in the fight his heart was stout,
The day he saved the captain's life, that day he lost his own,
And spoke some manly parting words, and died without a groan.
The captain closed his eyelids with a choking in his throat,
And sent him to his mother in his army overcoat.

The meeting-house was crowded full upon his burial day,
And scores and scores passed down the aisle to see him as he lay,
The foolish maiden noticed on his hand a ring of bone,
The Union shield cut on it, and wished it was her own;
And after prayer and hymn and speech and war-time anecdote
The earth received the soldier in his army overcoat.

—George Archibald.

Why He Was Shot.

All through the war, says the Inter-Ocean, it was very difficult to make the volunteer soldiers understand that they were guilty of any offense when they left the army and slipped off for a two or three weeks' visit at home. They laughed at the idea that this was desertion. But after two or three experiments of this kind a man became a little reckless. If he could stay two weeks at home, why not stay two months, and if he could stay two months, why not six months. One poor fellow reasoned in this way and convinced himself that he was doing his duty like a man because he was working to support his mother. When he was arrested as a deserter he laughed at the fears of the boys when he was returned to the camp under guard. But one night there came an order that this man be shot the next morning at 10 o'clock. This cleared the mists and doubts from his mind, and he said to his old comrades that from the minute the order was read to him he was a new man, but that not before that minute had he realized that he had been guilty of any crime. He was shot the next day in presence of his brigade and died like a soldier.

Administering Law in Maryland.

After the arrival of General Schenck in Cumberland, one of his first decisions was very characteristic. A Confederate Colonel had sold a negro to the Confederate government, taking pay, of course, in script. The negro, employed in fortification, managed to escape to Cumberland, where he took the opportunity to spread himself considerably.

A constable, knowing the circumstances, and wishing to make a little money out of the affair, had the negro thrown into prison as an escaped slave. General Schenck, on hearing of the affair, sent for the parties.

"By what right," he asked the constable, "do you hold this man prisoner?"

"As a fugitive from service," was the reply.

"Don't you know that he escaped from the Confederate service?"

"Yes, but we have a law in Maryland that covers the case, General."

"And I have a law upon which it can be decided. Col. Porter, set that negro at large and put the constable in his place."

Made Her Jump.

When the regiment to which I belonged was going down to call on the Johnnies, I happened to look out of the window of the car at which I sat, and saw some distance ahead a house near the railroad track. A woman and four or five children were standing near the door. Thinking to have a little fun, I took my revolver out of my pocket and held it outside straight down by the side of the car, and as I was in front of the door pulled the trigger. Did she jump? Well, boys, you should have seen her. She lifted herself from the ground, and she did not wait to get hold of her shoe-strings, either. I could hear her yell above the roar of the train, and I will bet that woman, if she is alive, thinks to this day that some Yankee shot at her that day.

Germany utilizes 20 per cent of her waterpower, Switzerland 25 per cent, and France only 11 per cent.

SMITHY SONG.

When I am half a-dreaming,
And only half asleep;
When daylight's grayest gleaming
'Gins through the blinds to peep,
Oh, then I hear the dinging,
Of the smithy hammers ringing,
Ching, ching, ching, ching,
Ching, ching, ching, ching.

At eve when I'm returning,
From labors of the day,
Their forges yet are burning,
And still their hammers play;
And oft the smiths are singing,
To that measured, merry ringing,
Ching, ching, ching, ching,
Ching, ching, ching, ching.

Often with rhythmic bending
Of bodies to and fro,
They toil in couples, sending
The sparks out, blow on blow;
One hammer always swinging,
The while the other's ringing,
Ching, ching, ching, ching,
Ching, ching, ching, ching.

O merry anvils sounding
All day till set of sun!
It is by steady pounding
That noblest tasks are done,
By sturdy blows and swinging,
That keeps the world a-ringing,
Ching, ching, ching, ching,
Ching, ching, ching, ching.

THE ELEVENTH HOUR

"I am not at home to anyone, Jenks."

"Yes, sir. Shall I take tea into the library, sir?"

"No," was the curt answer. The door of the library was closed with a decisive hand and locked.

He crossed over to the fireplace and stood for a few minutes leaning on the mantelpiece, with his haggard eyes staring down into the recess of the glowing coal. Then he seated himself at the writing table, and for the next ten minutes there was no sound but the tearing of papers. He wrote two letters, both equally brief, and addressed one to his wife and the other to his lawyers and placed them before him, without a pause, he opened a little drawer and brought out a small revolver. He did pause then, and moving his head took a slow survey of the room. The hand pointed to five minutes to 5.

"NOT CROSS WITH ME?"

A grim smile flitted over his face.

"I will wait until 5," he said aloud.

Four minutes to the hour. Three minutes. Two. Eternity swung in sight—the portals of death were open when someone knocked with a boldness that demanded entrance.

"What do you want? Who is it?"

"It's me, father—Doll," said a clear, childish voice.

"Go away, Doll," he said thickly. "Go to Miss Carter, Doll—I'm—busy."

"But Miss Carter's gone to a wedding and she won't be home till 7, and it's dreadfully lonely."

"I can't see you now."

"Not when it's my birthday?" indignantly.

In spite of everything he could not withstand her. He must let her in for a minute and then send her away. He slipped the revolver into his drawer again and opened the door.

"Oh, daddy, how cold you are; and yet"—peeping past him—"you have got a lovely fire. Darling, are you cross, or not well?"

"A bit of both, perhaps, Doll."

"Not cross with me?"

"No, Doll, no."

"You were lonely like me, weren't you? And you wanted me—really?"

"Old woman, I can't let you stay here—this evening."

"Are you very busy, darling?"

"Yes."

She gave a deep sigh.

"It was dreadfully lonely upstairs," she began apologetically; "I don't care two pins about Miss Carter being away, but it's—my birthday, and—and"—tragically—"you never wished me any happy returns."

"I am a brute, Doll," he said unsteadily.

He took her little round chin in his fingers and looked down into her honest eyes—replicas of her lovely mother's, but with a depth, a soul in them that had never shone in the sparkling orbs of the fashionable beauty. Now as Doll's eyes met his he flinched before them, for their pure glance seemed to reach the recess of his guilty soul.

"Ten to-day, are you? Getting quite an old lady," with a forced smile. "Good angels guard you, sweetheart, for many years—happy years."

"Father, let me have tea with you—it would be a perfectly glorious birthday party. Say yes, do."

"Very well," he said quietly. "Have your own way, Doll."

She gave a little ecstatic scream and flew into the hall like a radiant white bird, too important to ring.

"Jenks, Jenks! I am going to have tea with father! Bring it to the library directly, please, and the cake!"

She was back again, all movement and vivacity. The man from the chair where he had thrown himself could not take his haggard eyes from her—she seemed the very embodiment of life.

And after the tea was over he could not get rid of her without absolute sternness.

"Do you remember last birthday, darling? I was 9, and mumsey gave a ball. She promised me one this birthday, but she had to go to the Latouches, you know. Mumsey is away a great lot," she said with a little regretful sigh.

"And you are very disappointed to be done out of your party, old woman?"

"Not very," said Doll stoutly. "Next year mumsey is sure to be at home, she says so. And she sent me this. Isn't she a darling, sweet mumsey?"

She opened a little gold locket attached to a slender chain round her neck and showed him the charming, smiling face of her mother.

He took it in his hand and looked at it long and intently. To-morrow those gay blue eyes would be clouded—that haughtily poised head abased with his dishonor. Well, he thought bitterly, she had had her hand in it. They had never run well together—she had gone her own way and he his. Once things might have been different—was it his fault or hers? He closed the locket with a little snap and let it fall again on Doll's breast.

"And this is her letter—look darling. I'll read it to you: 'So sorry, my sweet Doll, to be away on your birthday—but this is an old engagement, you know, and Lady Latouche would not let me off. Next birthday—indeed, when I return—we must make up for it. I am sending you something to console you. I hope my Doll is a good little girl and does what Miss Carter tells her. Take good care of father.'"

"And I am, aren't I?" Doll broke off to say.

"Yes, Doll, yes, old woman. You—you would miss me a bit if—supposing that I was lost, now?"

"Do men ever get lost?"

"Often, Doll."

"Then I would die," said Doll, tragically.

"Nonsense! Mothers always count for more, don't they?" he persisted.

She pressed round his face and looked at him critically.

"Do they—always?" she whispered.

"Mostly, Doll."

"But sometimes you—they could love the fathers just a wee quarter of an inch more, couldn't they?"

He considered the question, while she watched him anxiously.

"They might sometimes, Doll."

"It wouldn't be wicked?"

"No, of course not."

She gave a deep sigh of relief.

He put his arms round the little warm body, and pressed her close to him. And as he held her there a sudden love of life—a remembrance of all the best and highest of the life he had so basely ill-used—came back and stirred his pulses with gladness and pain.

He closed his eyes dizzily, and leaned against Doll's shoulder. How near had been Death—and Doll had come between them! He reviewed the mad acts of the last few days—the maddest acts of his spoiled life. He had dishonored the name that generations of good-living men had transmitted to him. That very afternoon—was it only this afternoon or centuries ago?—his lawyers had begged him to pull in, to retrench. They had asked him to go abroad until they could settle his submerged affairs. They had sworn that if he would promise them to give up his mad gambling they would be able yet in time to save an honored name—an honored house. And what had his answer been? He had flung away from them with a laugh. "Let my name and place go. My whole existence has been a mistake. I shall go to the devil my own way."

And then in the place of Death and dishonor had come—Doll. He was alive, thank God! Thank God!

"Doll, darling, wise old woman, did you ever turn over a new leaf?"

"Lots," said Doll promptly.

"Well, I've turned over one, all the leaves in my book are stained but this one, but I am going to keep this clean. And, Doll, to-morrow you and I are going in search of the very loveliest birthday present that we can find in the whole of London. But I have given you one to-night, dear."

"What?" asked Doll eagerly and puzzled.

He stooped down and kissed her, and she hugged him gleefully, for she thought his kiss was the gift, but he knew it was his life.—London Opinion.

A Queen May Look at a Man.

There is an old story current in his home city, Brooklyn, about the late Dr. Theodore L. Cuyler, which illustrates how a son is to his mother the most important being in the world. In Dr. Cuyler's case one could not justly question his ability and usefulness. Besides being a successful pastor he was the author of many religious books which were read here and abroad, as well as a frequent contributor to certain magazines.

When he was in England he and his mother corresponded regularly, and at great length, so the tradition goes.

One day a letter came in which he described his presentation to Queen Victoria. Mrs. Cuyler read it with eagerness, hardly able to wait till she had finished before telling some one what had happened. When she at last got through the letter she hastened to a neighbor's house and announced: "I've just got a letter from England, and, do you know, the queen has seen Theodore."

A Provision.

Boss Lineman—Madam, we are going to string some poles in front of your house.

Mrs. Backwoods—Go ahead. But mind, the baby's asleep, so don't do any shootin' into the furriners after ye lynch 'em.—Puck.

The Redemption of David Corson

By CHARLES FREDERIC GOSS

Copyright, 1909, by The Bowen-Merrill Company. All Rights Reserved

CHAPTER VI.—(Continued.)

He did not dare communicate this story even to his sister; for if she knew nothing he feared to poison her existence by telling her, and if she knew all he had not the courage to listen to the sequel. Perhaps no other experience in life produces a more profound shock than a discovery like that upon which David had so suddenly stumbled. It leads to despair or to melancholy, and many a life of highest promise has been suddenly wrecked by it. While he brooded over this mystery the days slipped past the young mystic almost unnoted; he wandered about the farm, passing from one fit of abstraction into another, doing nothing, saying nothing, thinking everything.

He tried to look forward to the future with hope. But how can a man hope for harvests, when all his seed corn has been destroyed? If his father was bad, what hope was there that he could be better?

He made innumerable resolves to take up the duties of life where he had laid them down, but they were all like birds which die in the nest where they are born.

Pepeeta was drawing him irresistibly to herself; he was like a man in the outer circle of a vortex, of which she was the center. The touch of her soft hand which he could still feel, the farewell glance of eyes which still glowed before his imagination, attracted him like a powerful magnet. It was true that he did not know where she was; but he felt that he could find her in the uttermost parts of the earth by yielding himself to the impulse which had awakened in his heart.

"A dark veil of mystery hangs over my past. My present is full of misery and unrest. I will see if the future has any joys in store for me," he said to himself at the close of one of his restless days.

Without so much as a word of farewell, he crept out of the house in the gathering dusk, and started in pursuit of the bright object that floated like a will-o'-the-wisp before his inner eye.

A feeling of exultation and relief seized him as he left the place made dark and dreadful by the memory of that tragic scene through which he had so recently passed; the quiet of the evening soothed his perturbed spirits, and the tranquil stars looked down upon him with eyes that twinkled as if in sympathy.

CHAPTER VII.

Although David did not know the exact route the quack had laid out for his journey, he was certain that it would be easy enough to trace him in that sparsely-settled region, and so he turned his face in the direction in which the equipage vanished when he watched it from the barn.

It was not until the light of morning struggled through this universal gloom that the weary and bedraggled traveler entered the outskirts of the then straggling but growing and busy village of Hamilton. Tired in body and benumbed in mind, he made his way to the hotel, conscious only of his desire and determination to look once more upon the face of the woman whose image was so indelibly impressed upon his mind.

Approaching the desk he nervously asked if the doctor was among the guests, flushed at the answer, demanded a room, ascended the steep staircase, and was soon in bed and asleep. Fatigued by his long tramp, he did not awaken until after noon, and then, having bathed, dressed and broken his long fast, he knocked at the door of the room occupied by the doctor and his wife.

There was a quick but gentle step in answer to his summons, and at the music of that footfall his heart beat tumultuously. The door opened, and before him stood the woman who had brought about this mysterious train of events in his life.

She started back as she saw him, with an involuntary and timid motion, but so great was her surprise and joy that she could not control her speech or action sufficiently to greet him.

"Who is in there?" cried the doctor, in his loud, imperative voice.

"Mr. Corson," she answered, in tones that were scarcely audible.

"Corson? Who is Corson, and what does he want?" he asked, rising and approaching the door.

The instant his eyes fell on the countenance of the Quaker, he threw up both hands and uttered a prolonged whistle of astonishment.

"The preacher!" he exclaimed. "The lost is found. The p-p-prodigal has returned. Come in, and let us k-k-kill the fatted calf!"

Coarse as the welcome was, it was full of sincerity, and its heartiness was like balm to the wounded spirit of the youth. He grasped the extended hand and permitted himself to be drawn into the room.

Pepeeta, who had recovered from the first shock of surprise and delight, came forward and greeted him with a shy reserve. She gave him her hand, and its gentle touch reanimated his soul. She smiled at him—a gracious smile, and its light illumined the darkness of his heart. His sadness vanished. He once more felt an emotion of joy.

The excitement of their meeting having subsided they seated themselves, David in an easy chair, the doctor on the broad couch, and Pepeeta on a little ottoman at his feet. Vivid green curtains partially obscured the bright sunshine which beat upon the windows. The wall-paper was cheap, vulgar, faded. On the floor was an old ingrain carpet full of patches and spattered with ink stains. A blue-bottle fly whizzed and butted his head against the walls, and through the open casement hummed the traffic of the busy little town.

Nothing could have been more expressive of triumph and delight than the face of the quack. Whenever his feelings were particularly bland and expansive, he had a way of taking the ends of his enormous moustache and twiring them between his spatulate thumbs and fingers. He did this now, and twisted them until the coarse hairs could be heard grating against each other.

"Well, well!" he said, "so you could not resist the temptation? Ha! ha! ha! No wonder! It's not every young fellow behind the p-p-plow-tail that has a fortune thrust under his nose. Shows your good sense. I was right. I always am. I knew you were too bright a man to hide your light under a half b-b-bushel of a village like that. In those seven-by-nine towns, all the sap dries out of men, and before they are 40 they begin to rattle around like peas in a p-p-uod. In such places young men are never anything but milk sops, and old men anything but b-b-bald-headed infants! You needed to see the werld, young man. You required a teacher. You have put yourself into good hands, and if you stay with me you shall wear d-d-diamonds."

"Whatever the results may be, I have determined to make the experiment," said David, shrugging his shoulders.

"Right you are. But what b-b-brought you round? You were as stiff as a ramrod when I left you."

"Circumstances over which I had no control, and which I want to forget as soon as possible. My old life has ended and I have come to seek a new one."

"A new life? That's good. Well—we will show it to you, P-P-Pepeeta and I! We will show you."

"The sooner the better. What am I to do?"

"Not so fast! There are times when it is better to g-g-go slow, as the snail said to the lightning. We must make a b-b-bargain."

"Do as you please. All I ask is a chance to put my foot upon the first round of the ladder and if I do not get to the top, I shall not hold you responsible," David replied, dropping the "thees" of his Quaker life, in his determination to divest himself of all its customs as rapidly as he could.

"Hi! hi! There's fire in the flint! Good thing. You take me on the right side, D-D-Davy. I'll do the square thing by you—see if I d-d-don't. Let's have a drink. Bring the bottle, Pepeeta!"

She went to the mantel and returned with a flask and two glasses. The quack filled them both and passed one to David. It was the first time in his life that he had ever even smelt an intoxicant. He recoiled a little; but having committed himself to his new life, he determined to accept all that it involved. He lifted the fiery potion to his lips, and drank.

"Hot, is it, my son?" cried the doctor, laughing uproariously at his wry face. "You Quakers drink too much water! Freezes inside of you and t-t-turns you into what you might call two-p-p-pronged icicles. Give me men with red blood in their veins! And there's nothing makes b-b-blood red like strong liquors!"

The whisky revived the courage and loosened the tongue of the youth. The repugnance which he had instinctively felt for the vulgar quack began to mellow into admiration. He asked and answered many questions.

"What part am I to take in this business?" he asked.

"What part are you to take in the business? That's good, 'Never put off till to-morrow what you can d-d-do to-day.' 'Business first and then pleasure.' 'The soul of business is dispatch.' These are good mottoes, my lad. I learned them from the wise men; but if I had not learned them, I should have invented them. What's your p-p-part of the business, says you; listen! You are to be its m-m-mouthpiece. That tongue of yours must wag like the tail of a d-d-dog; turn like a weather-vane; hiss like a serpent, drip with honey and poison, be tipped with p-p-persuasion; tell ten thousand tales, and every tale must sell a bottle of p-p-panacea!"

He paused, and looked rapturously upon the face of his pupil.

"This panacea—has it merits? Will it really cure?" asked David.

The doctor laughed long and loud.

"Has it merits? Will it really cure? Ho! ho! 'Is thy bite good for the b-b-bachache?' said the sick mouse to the cat. What difference does it make whether it will cure or not? Success in b-b-business is not based upon the quality of the m-m-merchandise, my son."

"Upon what, then?" said David.

"Upon the follies, the weaknesses and the p-p-passions of mankind! Since time began, a 'universal panacea' has been a sure source of wealth. It makes no difference what the panacea is, if you only have the b-b-brains to fool the people. There are only two kinds of people in the world, my son—the fools and f-f-foolers!"

Even whisky could not make David listen to this cold-blooded avowal without a shudder. The keen eye of the quack detected it; but instead of adulterating his philosophy, he doubled his dose.

"Shocks you, does it? You will g-g-get over that. We are not angels! We are only men. Remember what old Jack Falstaff said? 'If Adam fell in a state of innocency, what shall I d-d-do in a state of villainy?'"

The boldness of the man and the radicalness of his philosophy dazzled and fascinated the inexperienced youth. This was what the astute and unscrupulous instructor expected, and he determined to pursue his advantage and effect, if possible, the complete corruption of his pupil in a single lesson; and so he continued:

"Got to live, my son! Self-p-p-preservation is the first law, and so we must imitate the rest of the b-b-brute creation, and live off of each other! The big ones must feed upon the little and the strong upon the weak. 'Every man for himself!' That's my religion."

"You may be right," said David, "but I cannot say that I take to it kindly. I do not see how a man can practice this cruelty and injustice without suffering."

"Suffering! Idea of suffering is greatly exaggerated. Ever watch a t-t-toad that was being swallowed by a snake? looks as if he positively enjoyed it. It's his mission. Born to be eaten! If there was as much pain in the world as p-p-people say, do you think anybody could endure it! Isn't the d-d-door always open? Can't a man quit when he wants to? Suffering! Pshaw! Do I look as if I suffered? Does Pepeeta look as if she suffered? And yet she's b-b-bamboobles them worse than I do. Back in your own little t-t-town she caught some of your long-faced old Quakers, b-b-big fellows with broad-brimmed hats, drab coats and ox eyes, regular meetin'-goers! And there was that little d-d-dove-eyed girl. What was it she wanted to know, P-P-Pepeeta? Tell him. Ha! ha! Tell him and we will see him b-b-blush."

"She asked me if her father was going to send her to Phialadelphia this winter," she answered, without lifting her eyes.

"Why don't you tell me what she asked you 'bout D-D-Davy?"

"It is time for us to go to supper or we shall be late," she replied, laying aside her work and rising.

"Sure enough!" cried the doctor, springing to his feet. "The Q-Q-Quaker has knocked everything out of my head. Come on!"

He rose and began bustling about the room. When Pepeeta glanced up from her work she saw in David's eye a grateful appreciation of her courtesy and tact, and his look filled her with a new happiness.

The disgust awakened in the Quaker's mind by the coarseness of the quack was more than offset by the beauty and grace of the gypsy. When he looked at her, when he was even conscious of her presence, he felt a happiness which compensated for all that he had suffered or lost. He did not stop to ask what its nature was. He had cast discretion to the winds. He had in these few hours since his departure broken so utterly with the past that he was like a man who had been suddenly awakened from a long lapse of memory. His old life was as if it had never been. He felt himself to be in a vacuum, where all his ideas must be newly created. This epoch of his experience was superimposed upon the other like a different geological formation. Like the old monks in their cells, he was deliberately trying to erase from the parchment of his soul all that had been previously written, in order that he might begin a new life history.

BOARDING HOUSE ECONOMIES.

They Are Many and Vigorous, Including the Paper Bag Diet.

"The boarding house keeper isn't the only one that economizes, not by a long shot," said the plumber who has a shop up in one of the boarding house districts of New York to a New York World writer. "Of course, I am used to being called in to check the flow of water from the bathtub faucets and to replace gas tips with those that do not burn so much gas. But there are plenty of boarders who do all their laundry work in their rooms. The other day I had a call for a new wash bowl for one of these laundry workers. She had the bowl full of shirts and things, and was rubbing away to beat the band, when the bowl gave away and the week's wash was precipitated on the floor and most of the water ran through to the ceiling below. It certainly was a mess. And it cost her a pretty penny, too, before she had all the damage paid for.

"But the funniest thing that has happened in a good while to my thinking was the fat woman who put her foot in the wash bowl, and down came the bowl. You wouldn't think to see the woman that she could get her foot up so high, any more than you would expect her to kick the mantelpiece. That made a fine mess too. I put in half a day mending the damage she had done to the pipes, and now I'll bet she uses a foot tub.

"I hear a good deal about these objectionable economies in lodging houses as I go the rounds of my work. I have seen mahogany tables used for ironing and I have seen signs of chafing dishes used on the top of the piano and the alcohol spilled over everything. The electric iron in the houses equipped with electric lighting has made the ironing much easier for the women who prefer to live in one room, take their meals from paper bags and now and then get a dinner out.

"Men are not given to these economies, although there was an old miser who used to board at the Hotel Windsor years ago who was noted for washing his handkerchiefs and socks and everything he could, so that he wouldn't have to pay out so much. One day he went out and left the water running, and it flooded the room and ran through to the floor below and it cost him $2,000 to have it fixed. That is a stock story among plumbers and boarding house keepers.

"Living and eating in one room has become such a feature of New York life that there are now some first class hotels that pretend not to notice that it is done. A bureau drawer is converted into a larder and here are hidden paper bags and little wooden boats containing portions of things purchased at the delicatessen. Every day madame goes out with a small hand satchel at the dinner hour and this same traveling bag may be utilized to bring in a small platter of beef and a portion of vegetables. Even hotels close their eyes to this breaking of the rules, and between the paper bag diet and bringing in dinner cooked at the little restaurant around the corner where you can get a dinner for 25 cents, it is possible to execute the most rigid economies in your one room in a good hotel.

At the Beach.

"Could you love me, and me alone?"

"Why, what a foolish question, Jack."

"Pardon my doubts."

"Where are you going to spend your vacation?"

"I'm not going to."

"I just earn my vacation—my family spends it."—Cleveland Leader.

WOMAN'S SPHERE

Saves Trying on Hats.

Whether the millinery device designed by a New York man will be as popular as it is ingenious remains to be seen. According to the prevailing opinion of a woman's department in a millinery store, it does not seem likely. The device consists of a large card with an opening large enough to admit a woman's head. Above this opening is painted a hat of some particular design, while below is a design to represent a bust portion of a woman's waist. The idea is to have a millinery supplied with a painted reproduction of every hat in stock. When customers come in they look the hats over on their stands, and when they see styles they would like to try on stand in front of a mirror and put their heads in the card bearing the design of those particular pieces of headgear. This plan saves a great deal of wear and tear on hats and saves the customer a great deal of time, but whether it will be appreciated by the fair sex is a matter of grave doubt.

Health and Beauty Hints.

A flannel bag or hot alt is very useful and comforting, not only for rheumatism, but for any muscular pain.

Peroxide, the application of which sometimes prevents the growth of superfluous hair, is apt to have an injurious effect upon the skin by overtrying it.

To alleviate the effects of a blow little ones often receive at play the old-fashioned remedy of a little butter or olive oil rubbed on immediately is excellent. It should be removed every half hour for an hour or two.

As a knock hard enough to bruise the eye may cause serious trouble, one should be careful when walking in the dark in unaccustomed spots to protect the face and chest by raising the arm about to the level of the nose and keeping it bent in front of you.

Lemon being an astringent, it is particularly good if the pores of the skin are enlarged. It is excellent to rub on the yellow line on the neck where the collar ends. Be careful not to use lemon juice too continuously, as it sometimes hurts delicate skin.

The habit of grimacing overexercises the mouth and draws unpleasant lines about it. The woman whose family tells her of this defect should count herself fortunate, and endeavor continually to check these mannerisms which threaten to disfigure her.

It is foolish to put drops in the eyes to give them an added luster, as this will, in the course of time, if it is kept up, almost entirely ruin the eyesight. If the eyes feel heavy and tired bathe them with weak salt water, either hot or cold. This can do no harm and will relieve the strained sensation.

A home-made specific for tan and sunburn consists of paste made from magnesia and lemon juice. Apply to the neck and arms by means of a linen bandage or directly to the skin, covering it with a cheesecloth. Allow the bandage to remain on for several minutes, then wash off in tepid water which has a dash of witch hazel in it. Apply twice a day if necessary.

To Make Sleep Come.

If you cannot get asleep try a sponge bath made thus: Into eight ounces of alcohol put two of ammonia and two of camphor. Shake thoroughly, and when well mixed add four ounces of sea salt and enough hot water to fill a quart bottle. To apply it, adds the Family Doctor, pour a little of the liquid in a shallow dish, moisten the whole body a little at a time by dipping a small sponge in it. Rub on only a very little, then finish with a vigorous rubbing with a coarse crash towel. Get into bed, and we'll insure the quick arrival of "nature's quick restorer, balmy sleep."

Washing Blankets.

Put a cupful of soft soap and two tablespoonfuls of borax into a tub of lukewarm water. When this has had time to entirely dissolve put in your blankets and let them stand for half a day. Then wash carefully and rinse thoroughly in several waters. Do not wring them. Have some one take hold of one end of the blanket and you grasp the other firmly in your hand. Shake the blanket carefully and hang up to dry.

Proper Love for Wife.

"When a man really loves his wife he ought to combine all his nicest sentiments toward other women into one big sentiment for her.

"He should show her the respect he feels toward his mother, the politeness he shows other women, and the responsibility he feels toward his sister.

"To all of that he should add the great love he should feel for a wife."

Broke Pie-Making Record.

Mrs. Wyman, aged 70, of Pittsfield, Mass., recently broke all records in her piemaking career. She made seventy-two pies of nine different varieties, as follows: Custard, apple, cocoanut, prune, raisin, squash, chocolate, blueberry and lemon. Mrs. Wyman did the work alone and had it finished by noon.

Woman Wins Golf Honors.

The supremacy of man now is being challenged by women in the game of golf. Miss Ida Leitch, a young Englishwoman, has developed such skill that it is believed she will prove a rival for the best professionals, including Taylor, the British champion and the player most admired by President Taft. Few women have developed real skill at golf, but Miss Leitch has the application and the patience necessary to a steady game over the hard courses. The other day she turned in a score of 72 for the Silloth course, one of the hardest in the United Kingdom, breaking the amateur record and coming within two strokes of the professional record. Miss Leitch is looked upon as by far the best of all women players. She is planning to visit this country next summer.

To Remove Tan.

One of the most celebrated recipes for removing tan is the following English recipe: Best English mustard, one tablespoonful; oil of sweet almonds, one tablespoonful, and lemon juice to make a thick paste.

Mix and spread in a thin plaster over the face, keeping it well away from the eyes and leaving it on the skin until it smarts. In a few days the scarf skin will become loosened and will gradually rub off, carrying the tan and freckles with it.

Vichy water, applied night and morning, is also effective in removing tan and freckles.

A Womanly Woman.

She stayed at home.
You don't hear of her.
She was too busy to talk.
She was too well bred to brag.
She didn't say she disliked hotels.
She murmured not when Mrs. Rich drove off.
She didn't declare resort life too vapid.

HIGH CROWNS AND A FEATHER FEATURES OF NEWEST HATS.

There are hats and hats. This fall's newest style hats are turned up and turned down, trimmed heavily and trimmed very simply—but the crown must be high, and it must have a feather on it somewhere. Above are some of the styles.

She was making school dresses for wear later.

She was taking her children for day excursions into the open places.

She has explained all she can of the flowers, trees and insect life.

She studies some good nature books along with the children before their excursions.

She has superintended her children's games and their gardening efforts, in addition to her own work.

And she's the "salt of the earth," this woman who is above aping those with more money, and who rejoices in a fine mind and body, which she puts to the best possible use.—Philadelphia Record.

Elaborate Bodice Design.

An extremely smart and effective design for a separate blouse which would be pleasing made up in soft silk or wash materials is pictured here. A complicated arrangement of tucks in various widths combined with eyelet embroidery or lace is used. The plastron is outlined by a broad piping of delicate silk, as are also the tucked sleeve caps. Little buttons and loops trim the diagonal front closing. The deep cuffs are of allover lace. The high tucked collar is made of mousseline de sole and the design of the front is repeated in the back.

To Clean Lamp Chimneys.

An excellent cleaner for lamp chimneys is made by fastening to the end of a stick a sponge just large enough, when immersed in water, to fit the chimney. Wipe your chimney inside with this, and, after rinsing, dry with a soft piece of linen.

Cultivate a Graceful Walk.

Very few girls walk gracefully nowadays, in spite of the craze for physical culture. The most generally noticeable faults are a forward droop of the head, sticking out of the elbows and scraping the feet. The girl who walks with a forward stoop accentuates all these faults and lays herself open to various diseases as well. Because, if you slouch forward, you compress the lungs, and prevent proper expansions of the chest. Consequently the lungs are insufficiently supplied with fresh air, and the body does not get enough oxygen for the requirements of health.

Carrots for Complexion.

Carrots are said to be excellent for the complexion, and here is a good way to prepare them: Wash, scrape off the skin, cut into dice and leave in cold water for half an hour. Put in the inner compartment of a double boiler with no water upon them except that which clings to them after washing. Cover closely and cook tender. An hour should be long enough for this. Turn into a deep dish, pepper and salt and cover with a good white sauce. Peas may be added, and the combination is delicious.

Fads and Fancies in Dress

Collars are now practically even all around and are very high. Tabs and points have disappeared.

Scotch zephyrs in all the new berry colors with a good amount of white in the weave will be suitable for one-piece dresses.

Black chantilly shawls come in as an excellent drapery over silk gowns. It is not necessary to cut the shawl, though it is draped and held in place with rosettes of soft satin.

The latest whim of the Parisian is carrying the evening gloves in the hand instead of wearing them. Rings have grown to such large size and are so numerous that the wearing of gloves becomes a question and the result is their banishment.

Chiffon bishop sleeves have a portion of the uppers made of dress material. The noticeable puff and fluting at the hand have a tendency to make the hand appear much smaller.

Picturesquely reminiscent of the middle ages are the popular casquines, made of corded silk, with short sleeves and somewhat elaborate with jetting. The skirts worn with jackets of this kind are rather full.

The skirt for street wear is noticeably long, and the skirt of sheer garments is also quite long. Modistes are fast bringing in dresses that must be slightly lifted at the hem in order that the wearer may take a step. This style made its appearance when Paris muslins were adopted and the feminine dress lovers were delighted with the long, billowy white dress and blue ribbons.

Club Favors Short Skirts.

The Short Skirt League is the name of a new organization formed in London, the members having been induced to form a club when they beheld the horrible sight of women trailing along with the dust of the street adhering to their dresses.

To Label Tin Cans.

For sticking labels to tin, mix dextrine and vinegar to the consistency to suit, then add about 2 ounces of honey to the pint of paste. If too much honey is used the labels will have a greasy appearance and will not dry right.

Idea for Sweeping Day.

Save the clean grass out from the lawn, sprinkle it over the carpet and sweep the room in the usual manner. It will accumulate every particle of floor dust, brighten the carpet and save a lot of dusting.

Boas and Beads.

The tulle ruffle has brought in its wake the feather boa, in which Paris is at present reveling. In that city the boa is worn so long that it falls almost to the hem of the skirt, and is very fat and round in all its length.

To Clean Knives.

In order to keep your knives clean and bright, take some wood ashes and mix with fine scrapings of a raw Irish potato. Rub this over the blades with a cloth, and, after rinsing, dry with a soft flannel.

Hard to Lose.

"It's hard to lose a beautiful daughter," said the wedding guest sympathetically.

"It's a blamed sight harder to lose the homely ones," replied the old man, who had several yet to go.—Exchange.

OBLIVIOUS MODERN AGE.

Fallacy of Devoting Thought to Things That Don't Matter.

It is a curious characteristic of this modern age that we are devoting nearly all our thought to things which do not really matter, and that we rarely confer serious consideration upon those phases and features of life which are so essential that it is impossible to escape from them, says Clayton Hamilton in the Forum. Thus, we are thinking a great deal about flying machines, which the world has managed fairly well to live without for many centuries. On the other hand, we cannot possibly live without our bodies; and yet we rarely consider how we may best develop them in efficiency and beauty, though this was one of the main preoccupations of the Greeks. Nowadays we are very fussy about getting from New York to Chicago in fewer hours than twenty-four, in order that we may economize that precious entity we call our time; but we seldom bother to consider our eternity. The men of the middle ages devoted their best thought to religion because they found that it was something that they could not possibly escape; now, for the same reason apparently, we ignore it and assume the attitude thus phrased by Mr. Chesterton—Everything matters except Everything. Another of those haunting realities which men cannot live without is language. Therefore, at certain periods, like the renaissance for instance, the world at large has devoted considerable thought to it. But in this oblivious age of ours language is pretty generally ignored; and just because a man is doomed to employ it every day of life he deems it unnecessary ever to think about it. In mere material and secondary matters we insist on having the best, but we have a vague sense that our way of speaking and of writing is good enough as it is, and may be allowed to take care of itself. Hence we seldom pause to examine the language we employ in our hourly concerns, to question its efficiency or to endeavor to develop it in form and fluency.

FOOD QUESTION

Settled with Perfect Satisfaction by a Dyspeptic.

It's not an easy matter to satisfy all the members of the family at meal time as every housewife knows.

And when the husband has dyspepsia and can't eat the simplest ordinary food without causing trouble, the food question becomes doubly annoying.

An Illinois woman writes:

"My husband's health was poor, he had no appetite for anything I could get for him, it seemed.

"He was hardly able to work, was taking medicine continually, and as soon as he would feel better would go to work again only to give up in a few weeks. He suffered severely with stomach trouble.

"Tired of everything I had been able to get for him to eat, one day seeing an advertisement about Grape-Nuts, I got some and he tried it for breakfast the next morning.

"We all thought it was pretty good, although we had no idea of using it regularly. But when my husband came home at night he asked for Grape-Nuts.

"It was the same next day and I had to get it right along, because when we would get to the table the question, 'Have you any Grape-Nuts?' was a regular thing. So I began to buy it by the dozen pkgs.

"My husband's health began to improve right along. I sometimes felt offended when I'd make something I thought he would like for a change, and still hear the same old question, 'Have you any Grape-Nuts?'

"He got so well that for the last two years he has hardly lost a day from his work, and we are still using Grape-Nuts." Read the book, "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs. "There's a Reason."

Ever read the above letter? A new one appears from time to time. They are genuine, true, and full of human interest.

One Doctor—Only One

No sense in running from one doctor to another! Select the best one, then stand by him. No sense either in trying this thing, that thing, for your cough. Carefully, deliberately select the best cough medicine, then take it. Stick to it. Ask your doctor about Ayer's Cherry Pectoral for throat and lung troubles. Sold for nearly seventy years. No alcohol in this cough medicine. J. C. Ayer Co., Lowell, Mass.

Why try this thing, that thing, for your constipation? Why not stick to the good old reliable family laxative—Ayer's Pills? Ask your doctor if he approves this advice.

Knisely Dry Goods Company

Better Not Get Dyspepsia

If you can help it. Kodol prevents Dyspepsia, by effectually helping Nature to Relieve Indigestion. But don't trifle with Indigestion.

A great many people who have trifled with indigestion, have been sorry for it—when nervous or chronic dyspepsia resulted, and they have not been able to cure it.

Use Kodol and prevent having Dyspepsia.

Everyone is subject to indigestion. Stomach derangement follows stomach abuse, just as naturally and just as surely as a sound and healthy stomach results upon the taking of Kodol.

When you experience sourness of stomach, belching of gas and nauseating fluid, bloated sensation, gnawing pain in the pit of the stomach, heart burn (so-called), diarrhoea, headaches, dullness or chronic tired feeling—you need Kodol. And then the quicker you take Kodol—the better. Eat what you want, let Kodol digest it.

Ordinary pepsin "dyspepsia tablets," physics, etc., are not likely to be of much benefit to you, in digestive ailments. Pepsin is only a partial digester—and physics are not digesters at all.

Kodol is a perfect digester. If you could see Kodol digesting every particle of food, of all kinds, in the glass test-tubes in our laboratories, you would know this just as well as we do.

Nature and Kodol will always cure a sick stomach—but in order to be cured, the stomach must rest. That is what Kodol does—rests the stomach, while the stomach gets well. Just as simple as A, B, C.

Our Guarantee

Go to your druggist today and get a dollar bottle. Then after you have used the entire contents of the bottle if you can honestly say, that it has not done you any good, return the bottle to the druggist and he will refund your money without question or delay. We will then pay the druggist for the bottle. Don't hesitate, all druggists know that our guarantee is good. This offer applies to the large bottle only and to but one in a family. The large bottle contains 2½ times as much as the fifty cent bottle.

Kodol is prepared at the laboratories of E. C. DeWitt & Co., Chicago.

Court House News

A suit to quiet title has been filed in the circuit court by Charles D. and Jennie E. Knisely vs. C. Knisely et al.

In the matter of Real Estate and Improvement company of Baltimore vs. Charles F. Daub et. al., the defendants have filed a cross complaint to the suit on mortgage.

The jury found for the defendant in the case of Schulthess and Hathaway vs. Feagler after deliberating for a few hours.

A new case, entitled Nelson R. Allmong vs. Harry Bridinger et. al, suit on account, has been filed, the plaintiff demanding judgment in the sum of $375, also the foreclosure of a certain lien.

The grand jurors are still busily engaged in examining witnesses as to their knowledge of law violations and undoubtedly a grist of indictments will be returned. The sheriff is still subpoenaing witnesses.

The case of the Capitol Stock Food company of Tiffin vs. William Curle, suit on a note, is being tried before a jury in the circuit court Thursday afternoon. A representative of the Food company is here and he is represented by Attorney Price D. West, while the defendant's interests are being cared for by Attorney John Baxter. Some little time will be required for the disposal of the litigation.

Frank Rogers, of Garrett, against whom the grand jury returned indictments during their present session, appeared in court Wednesday afternoon, where he plead guilty to two charges. The first plea was to the charge of keeping a gaming house and for this offense he was assessed the minimum fine of $10 and costs and he also entered a plea of guilty to the charge of selling liquor without a license, the fine for this aggregating $50, and the trimmings. The total was something more than $80. The wife of Mr. Rogers was waiting at the interurban station and the confessed law violator secured from her the necessary funds with which to pay the fine and he was released from custody.

Votes for Women in Denver

"It was a decided mistake to give women the right of the ballot," says a woman politician of Denver in WOMAN'S HOME COMPANION for November

"But now that they have it, in my belief it is as much the duty of a woman to exercise that right as it is for her to observe her religious duties or to take proper care of her home. The average woman is better than the average man. At least that is my observationr The average woman politician is as bad as the average man politician—only she is worse! If the rank and file of women would join in one concerted movement to unseat both the professional man and the professional woman politician, then the right of franchise would prove a boon of inestimable value.

"Like many another woman, I entered politics with the idea of purifying the political atmosphere. Since then it has been a constant struggle on my part to keep my skirts clean. It is much the same as a woman marrying a man to reform him. In nine cases out of ten he braws her down to his own level instead of being lifted to hers.

"Women, generally speaking, vote to please the men. There are those who will take issue with this statement but it is nevertheless true. Perhaps it may be different after the women are better educated in political affairs, if that time should ever come, but under existing conditions the women vote as the men suggest. Left to themselves and uninfluenced by the men, the woman vote would be chaotic.

We wouldn't know where we stood in an election till after the votes were all in, because women are influenced by all manner of things the ordinary mortal would not reckon with. By way of example, a really handsome man is a strong asset for any political ticket in Colorado!

"Women are by nature of a trusting disposition in everything save love affairs. It is therefore an easy task for the men to control their votes. For that reason in planning a campaign we decide upon candidates and principles that appeal to the men and then leave it to them to win their wives, mothers, sisters or sweethearts over to their views."

The friends of William J. Bryan and of his daughter, Mrs. Ruth Bryan Leavitt, have begun an active movement looking to the nomination of Mrs. Leavitt for congress from the First Colorado district. The movement followed the formal announcement by Mrs. Leavitt that she would accept the democratic nomination ho uld it be tendered her. Her fathe is said to have consented to her making the race and it is predicted that should she be nominated he will invade Colorado and make some speeches in her behalf. T. M. Patterson, former United States senator from Colorado, and one of the democratic dictators of the state, has announced that if the democrats nominate a woman for con gress she will have his support. The club women of Denver are enthusiastic over Mrs. Leavitt's candidacy.

Our Dedication

Send out the glad tidings of this Memorial day,
Safe in our new home much prized along the way;
Fraternal love abound hearts that blend with cheer
Like anthems to resound its mystery doth appear.
Years have come and gone since first our order met,
The fire keeps raging on which o'er the country swept
To quench it all in vain her flames reach far and wide
As ocean waves do spread sure as the coming tide.

Hold high the royal banner a gem in history told
How friendship true is pleasure one that ne'er grows old.
Repeat the ancient story of Knighthood loyal and true.
How strength combined together a mission service do
A thrill of renown favor within these sacred walls
Give place to memories treasure as rays of light to fall
Peal forth in accent freely anew is born to man
In all its renown splendor a temple palace grand

Send out the proclamation, her majestic rights
A true reconciliation with due equity for all,
Proclaim to every nation this fraternal boon of love,
A flame of inspiration providential from above,
With pride and admiration millions honor to confess,
How in time of tribulation a true merit do express.
March on with Knightly honor aloud the chorus swell,
An order of progression, one where love and honor dwell.

Proclaim with veneration this tribunal wave of care,
Its assured renumeration, its full fraternity share,
Step out from vain emotion into fields of calm retreat,
Vows, best kept are tokens of a character most complete
Announce to civic relation, a court of justice enshrine
Of its most noble expression a cleansing like fire refine,
Cry out thou bounded liberty again the old story relate
Of brotherhoods affiliation to our temple commemorate.

Spring forth thy gates of Paradise, of thee thy grace declare,
Of gleaming, glittering stars that sacred Knighthood wear.
Bright fraternal armor clad in garments pure made white
Befitting only to a brother who with loyalty liveth right:
In life there cometh sunshine, hours of rayless gloom
That temper a wayward heart in fond submission commune,
The flower springeth forth in all brilliancy of form
Reluctantly to yield beneath the weather beaten storm.

Ring out ye bells of liberty, make merry thy tones to swell,
Out of the old home into the new to-day with pleasure we dwell,
Like as a fairy tale told, in mid-summer nights dream
Of grandeurs visionary sight in splendor as it doth seem,
Swift as the annals of time that carry us back on her wing,
Tells of each budding joy of hope good tidings to bring
Like a sound of revelry by night born on zephyr air,
Came the good news of victory of mansion bright and fair.

Go forth with renewed vigor as watchword keep in view,
The success of an order such as Knights of Pythians do
What they did for Butler since the year of '88,
With twenty chartered members had not a candidate,
From out this faithful number but few remain to tell
Those pioneers one fifty-eight who made our rank to swell
Until to-day our number, with pride we numerate
Two hundred and fifty Knights of more up to the present date,

Rejoice Sir Knight and neighbor as in skilled democracy,
Shut out from superstition and quaint hypocrisy,
A principality of peace purchased at wisdom's
Endowed with equi-liberty that promote and elevate man,
As the oak gigantic stand, the ancient king of forest tall,
Emblematic as an order keep on going work and toil
Until the golden sunset at the close of evening tide,
Victorious, as well tried Knights, in a haven of rest abide.

ALL WRONG

The Mistake is Made by Many Butler Citizens

Don't mistake the cause of backache. To be cured you must know the cause.

It is wrong to imagine relief is cure.
Backache is kidney ache.
You must cure the kidneys.
A Butler resident tells you how.

Mrs. Charlotte Steele, Pearl Street, Butler, Ind., says: "I suffered from rheumatic pains in my back and sides and I was subject to dull headaches. I had but little strength or ambition and was generally run down when my attention was called to Doan's Kidney Pills. Procuring a supply at Stone's drug store, I commenced using them and in a short time they cured me." (Statement given April 10, 1906.)

On December 19, 1908, Mrs. Steele confirmed the above and added: "I have no hesitation in again endorsing Doan's Kidney Pills. The cure this remedy made in my case has been permanent and at the present time I am free from every symptom of kidney complaint."

CONSUMPTION IS COMMON.

But the Vast Majority of Those Afflicted Recover.

A skilled surgeon and physician who executes the post-mortems at a well-known infirmary in the north of England says that recoveries from tuberculosis consumption are far more common than most persons believe. He writes:

"From post-mortems upon cases dying in the hospital from a variety of conditions, and which have shown during life no evidence of tubercular infection, I would compute the number of cases of cured tubercle at 60 per cent of the total post-mortems. In forming this computation I altogether disregard cicatrices found in lungs and include only gaseous calcareous nodules which are evidently of considerable age. This, together with the chemical fact that the patients have during life shown no sign of phythisis and have died from some entirely independent disease, leads one to assume, and I think justly, that these are cases of cured tubercle, and, further, that tuberculin infection in a human subject is far more common than has been previously estimated."

WHY SALVES FAIL TO CURE ECZEMA

They Clog the Pores—Only a Liquid Can Reach the Inner Skin

Since the old fashioned theory of curing eczema through the blood has been given up by scientists, many different salves have been tried for skin diseases. But it has been found that these salves only clog the pores and can not penetrate to the inner skin below the epidermis where the eczema germs are lodged.

This—the quality of penetrating—probably explains the tremendous success of the only standard liquid eczema cure, oil of wintergreen as compounded in D. D. D. Prescription. After ten years of cure after cure, the world's leading skin specialists have accepted this as the true eczema cure.

We ourselves do not hesitate to recommend D. D. D. Prescription at at $1.00 a bottle, but for the benefit of those who have never tried the prescription, we arranged with the D. D. D. Laboratories of Chicago for a special large trial bottle at 25 cents on a special offer now. This first bottle ought to convince every sufferer, and at any rate, it will surely take away the itch at once. S. G. Stone, Druggist, Butler, Ind.

The first number of the lecture course given last Friday evening by the Fisher Shipp Co. was an entire success and was highly entertaining. Speaking personally Miss Shipp was the star of the company, each selection whether musical or literary, held the audience spell bound. Perhaps one of the most charming of her literary gems was the recitation of Paul Lawrence Dunbar's Cornstalk Fiddle, accompanied by the piano. She struck a musical cadence with her voice, kept time with her foot and played an imaginary fiddle while she gave that fine poem in such a manner as to easily bring to mind the characteristic gracefulness of a southern cake walk. Her fine soprano voice was at its best in the closing selection when accompanied by Mrs. Heacock, the contraltoist, they sang a bridal chorus. Miss Alice Carey was a violin artist and won the audience by her sweet and unassuming ways. As a response to an encore she played Blue Bells of Scotland in a most appealing manner and reached the hearts of those not equal to classical music. Mr. Lloyd Loar was a mando artist and Mrs. Heacock a charming contraltoist.

John I. Fair, a respected farmer of Butler township, DeKalb county, dropped dead on Tuesday morning of last week, near the well at his home, aged forty-eight years. He is survived by a widow and two children, and an adopted daughter.

Next Tuesday is the election, and we do not believe there is a man on either ticket who would wait until this time and then start a falsehood to injure his opponent, and yet it is well for each and every voter to weigh well any rumor that may come to him. Every candidate on the democrat ticket comes before the people with a clean record, and each one of them is perfectly competent to fill the duties of the office for which they aspire. The HERALD is confident a large portion of the ticket will be elected, if not the entire ticket.

Shoe Department

Giving you your money's worth is by no means the only aim of our Shoe Department.

What matter's it if you get a five dollar shoe for three dollar if your feet are not fitted properly.

Foot Comfort—that's just as important (more so) than value received. We have studied this problem carefully and while are always endeavoring to improve our service to you we feel that we have about reached the top round of satisfactory shoe selling. Foot Comfort plus Foot Fashion coupled with reasonable prices, we feel entitles us to your consideration.

STAPLES

The reputation of a store is generally known by the quality of staples sold. We are glad to say we have always given as much attention to the buying of a piece of calico as to the buying of a piece of silk and the result is gratifying. We derive a great deal of pleasure from hearing a lady recommend this store if she is asked where to go to get a good piece of Gingham, Calico, Shirting or Domestic. Whether it be Shirting, Pillow Casing, Toweling, Etc., a visit to this department will convince you the lady was right and in turn you'll be telling your friends.

A Word With You About Our Guarantee of Satisfaction

To us this guarantee means that we must do anything necessary to make it good. If the merchandise is wrong, we want to know it as much as you do. Complaints are welcome; its the unuttered opinions that do the harm. The goods that come back don't do us one-tenth the injury of the mistakes we never hear about. If we find merchandise that's wrong and can't correct the fault; if we find a customer now and then who is particularly hard to satisfy—some people, you know, are more difficult to please than others. We can always give the customer their money back, if the goods are not satisfactory. If there were any fair way of going farther than that, we'd go farther.

NATIONS OF THE WORLD DECLARE WAR ON RATS

BARREL CRATES—(1) WITH STIFF PAPER COVER (2) WITH HINGED WOODEN COVER

Rats! The expression is generally one of contempt, but if a person would pause for a moment and consider that the damage done by these rodents in the United States alone amounts to over $20,000,000 a year the tone would be changed to that of fear. Occupying only a small part of the Old World at one time, through the continued spread of commerce these animals have been furnished free transportation to the most distant parts of the earth. Traps, poisons, gases and recently cultures supposed to spread fatal diseases have been resorted to to drive out the pest. In spite of all these the animals continue to prosper and multiply and their numbers and destructiveness keep pace with the advance of modern civilization. Though thousands and thousands have been killed it is only a short time before thousands and thousands more replace the slain. Unless some new method of extermination is devised the war promises to be never ending.

David E. Lantz, assistant, biological survey, has prepared an article on the brown rat that is highly interesting to all and instructive to those who are bothered by the pest. His ideas of the suppression of the reproduction of the rodent are the enactment and the rigid enforcement of municipal ordinances providing for the disposal of garbage and the protection of food supplies. He says:

"Every effort should be made to instruct as to the necessity for care in the disposition of refuse and the protection of food material. Tightly closed garbage cans, frequently emptied, will go far toward limiting the food available for rats. Grain bins in thousands of private and public stables now afford food and harborage for thousands of rats; public markets and feed, provision and grocery stores, notoriously lacking in protection from rats, should have their contents safeguarded from these animals.

"The advantages of cement in the cellars and foundations of public and private buildings are now so well understood that the rat-proofing of buildings by cement construction and other necessary measures should no longer be left to individual inclination and judgment, but should be incorporated in building regulations and these strictly enforced. The additional expense, compared with the advantage, is trivial.

"The early history of the brown rat is practically unknown. The species is generally supposed to be of Asiatic origin, but there is no positive knowledge as to its native country. The brown rat differs from the other two species in America in larger size, shorter head, more obtuse muzzle, smaller ears and relatively shorter tail. The general color is grayish brown above and whitish below. The overhairs of the upper part have black tips. The tail is usually shorter than the head and body combined, while in the other two species it is generally longer.

"During the plague of rats on the island of Jamaica, in 1833 the number killed on a single plantation was 38,000. The injury to sugar cane on the island by the animals was estimated at that time to be $500,000 a year. Over 12,000,000 were killed in India during a year. Observations show that climate and food supply greatly affect the rate of multiplication of rodents. The rat is no exception. It increases more rapidly in a moderately warm climate with an abundant supply of food.

"The destruction of feedstuffs by rats is a serious loss not only on the farm but in almost every city and village in the whole country. Often through the carelessness or indifference of servants the bin or barrel in which feed is kept is left uncovered, and the rats fairly swarm to the nightly feast. In cases investigated in Washington, D. C., the loss was equal to 5 or 10 per cent of the grain bought. A grocer was buying feed for two horses and several hundred rats; the horses were fed at regular intervals and the rats nearly all of the time. In the case of an establishment feeding from fifty to a hundred horses the loss of feed in the course of a year often amounts to a large item.

"Rats are very fond of malt and in malt houses and breweries constant watchfulness is necessary to prevent losses. Mills, elevators and warehouses in which grain is stored are likewise subject to the invasion of the animals. Also the destruction of sacks, barrels and bins is a large item of loss.

"The rodents are very fond of poultry and eggs. A commission merchant of Washington relates that he once stored in his warehouse 100 dozen eggs in a wooden tub with a lid of board nailed on. Rats gnawed a hole through the top and carried away all but twenty-eight and a half dozen, leaving no stains or shells to show that any had been broken. Rats are very destructive to tame pigeons and young squabs, game birds, fruit and vegetables.

"It is generally believed that mice and rats cause fire by igniting matches with their teeth. The testimony of chiefs of fire departments and insurance adjusters confirms this belief. Manufacturers of matches often dip the ends in paraffin to protect the phosphorus. The paraffin is attractive to rats and mice and the matches are often carried behind walls, under floors and behind partitions where they are gnawed. Rats have been known to gnaw through the lead gas pipes and cause explosions. Rats often do mischief by gnawing the insulating covering of telephone wires to obtain the paraffin it contains.

"At state and national fish hatcheries the rats cause much trouble by burrowing into embankments and gnawing holes through wooden tanks. They have been known to gnaw the hoofs of horses until they bled. They have been known to kill young lambs and pigs and to attack very fat hogs and eat holes in their body causing death.

"There is a child buried near the summit of Pike's Peak that is supposed to have been killed by rats.

"The most serious charge against rats grows out of their relation to human health. It is now positively known that rats are chiefly responsible for the spread of the bubonic plague, a malady which, in spite of modern methods of fighting it, has within the past dozen years destroyed over 5,000,000 human beings in India alone.

"Bubonic plague in man is entirely dependent upon the disease in the rat.

"The infection is conveyed from rat to rat and from rat to man solely by means of the rat flea.

"A case of bubonic plague in man is not in itself infectious.

"A large majority of plague cases occur singly in houses. When more than one case occurs in a house the attacks are generally simultaneous. (This proves that there is no soil infection.)

"Plague is usually conveyed from place to place by imported rat fleas, which are carried by people on their persons or in their baggage. The human agent not infrequently himself escapes infection.

"Unsanitary conditions have no relation to the occurrence of plagues except in so far as they favor infestation by rats.

"The non-epidemic season is bridged over by acute plague in the rat, accompanied by a few cases among human beings.

"Rats have been fought all over the world with renewed effort since this discovery has been made. The government on the Pacific slope has taken up the fight and has exterminated millions of the rodents.

"Except that to a limited extent rats act as scavengers, they render no important service to man.

"In former times, doubtless, their work as scavengers in cities was of considerable value, but modern methods of garbage disposal make this service insignificant.

"Among the methods for driving away rats that have proved useful under some circumstances are the following:

"1. Freshly slaked lime placed dry in all burrows and runs of rats.

"2. Freshly made thin whitewash poured into the rat burrows.

"3. A strong solution of copperas sprinkled in runs and burrow entrances.

"4. Chloride of lime, loose or wrapped in old rags, placed in burrows and runs.

"5. Gas tar daubed about the burrow entrances.

"6. Powdered red pepper scattered in rat runs and burrows.

"7. Caustic potash placed in the burrows and runs.

"Owing to their cunning it is not easy to catch rats by trapping. A few adults refuse to enter the most innocent looking trap. And yet trapping if persistently followed is one of the most effective ways of destroying the animal. For general use the improved modern trap with a wire fall released by a baited trigger driven by a coiled spring has marked advantages over the old trap, and many of them may be used at the same time. Probably those used entirely of metal are the best, as they are less liable to retain odors.

"Vienna sausage (Wienerwurst) and fried bacon are the best baits, and a part of an ear of corn is very attractive to the animals. In fact, they will attack anything edible that is offered them.

"The French wire cage traps are very good where rats are numerous. All cage traps should be baited and left open for a few nights so that the rats become accustomed to enter them in the search for food. As many as twenty-five partly grown rats have been caught at one time with one of these traps."

DAMAGE BY RATS.

The estimated damage done by rats in the various countries is as follows:

Denmark	$ 3,000,000
France	40,000,000
Germany	50,000,000
Great Britain	73,000,000
United States	20,000,000
Mexico	15,000,000
Canada	2,000,000

SUMMARY OF RECOMMENDATIONS.

The following are important aids in limiting the number of rats and reducing the losses from their depredations:

1—Protection of our native hawks, owls, and smaller predatory mammals—the natural enemies of rats.

2—Greater cleanliness about stables, markets, grocery stores, warehouses, courts, alleys and vacant lots in cities and villages, and like care on farms and suburban premises. This includes the storage of waste and garbage in tightly covered vessels and the prompt disposal of it each day.

3—Care in the construction of buildings and drains so as not to provide entrance and retreats for rats, and the permanent closing of all rat holes in old houses and cellars.

4—The early thrashing and marketing of grains on farms, so that stacks and mows shall not furnish harborage and food for rats.

5—Removal of outlying straw stacks and piles of trash or lumber that harbor rats in the fields.

6—Rat-proofing of warehouses, markets, cribs, stables and granaries for storage of provisions, seed grain and feed stuffs.

7—Keeping effective rat dogs, especially in city warehouses.

8—The systematic destruction of rats, whenever and wherever possible, by (a) trapping, (b) poisoning, and (c) organized hunts.

9—The organization of "rat clubs" and other societies for systematic warfare against rats.

CHICAGO 20,000 YEARS AGO; ICEBERGS THEN ITS CHIEF PRODUCT

Oak Park, a suburb of Chicago, is located on the highest point of land between Lake Michigan and the Des Plaines River—"on a hill seven feet high." But how came this commanding eminence there? Back in the frigid heart of the glacial period, about 20,000 years ago next December, the northern part of America was covered over with a great continental ice sheet. It was like the ice sheet which now covers Greenland; it was formed by the impaction of thousands of feet of snow, and flowed slowly southward, like the advance of very thick molasses candy on the surface of a plate. Finally there came a succession of mild winters, and the ice sheet began to recede; its extreme margin, which had been building up the Valparaiso hills, which skirt the southern end of Lake Michigan, retreated within the present basin of the lake, and slowly moved farther and farther north. Its place was taken by a lake—Lake Chicago. The surface of this lake was sixty feet above the present level of Lake Michigan.

The extent of Lake Chicago is somewhat indefinite, for the edge of the ice sheet formed its northern boundary and varied much from year to year as Old Mother Earth struggled to throw off its glacial burden. Eastward the lake included the present areas of Lake Huron and Lake Erie, and covered the region lying between them; a broad arm extending across southern Michigan from the Saginaw Valley connected its eastern and western portions. Lake Superior had at this time its own outlet into the Mississippi; Lake Ontario was still covered by the ice sheet.

Anything more desolate and awful than the scenery of Lake Chicago at this time it is difficult to conceive—a vast stretch of ice cold water, frozen over in the winter and dotted with icebergs in the summer. Where now stand the Auditorium icebergs grounded in June and great drifting floes creaked and groaned against each other through the dark days of the fall. There was no fish in the sea, no bird flew overhead, no animal walked or crawled along the desolate shore.

The outlet of Lake Chicago was southwest through the Des Plaines and Illinois rivers into the Mississippi. Lemont was in a mile-wide valley where once rolled the clear, chill waters which drained a basin extending from Chicago to Buffalo and from Green Bay to Georgian Bay.

In view of the comparative tameness of the scenery about Chicago it is enough to make one weep to think of this river—a mile wide, with rock bottom and sides, carrying a volume of water "comparable to Niagara," as says William C. Alden, of the United States Geological Survey, and descending seventy-six feet in a distance of ten miles. Through uncounted centuries that glory and grandeur went utterly to waste, so far as human beings are concerned; and now Chicagoans pay out thousands of dollars annually to go to see the rapids of the St. Lawrence and the Niagara.

In course of time this period of the lake's history came to an end. The rapids in the "Chicago outlet" cut back to the limestone lip at which they started and lowered the level of the lake some twenty feet. Here it was stationary once more through centuries of time. The waters were as lifeless and the scenery as desolate as ever, but the icebergs which drifted down Michigan boulevard were smaller, for the water was shallower. It was at this period that a large sandbar more than a mile wide formed in the shallow water.

Why is Chicago where she is? It has often been said that the great city of the lakes might just as well have been built on the site of Milwaukee, and that only the superior enterprise and commercial genius of Chicago's business men turned the scale. This is putting the cart before the horse; it was the superior advantage of Chicago's site that attracted these far-seeing men. Look at a map of the United States. Throughout a region extending from Joliet to Texas and from Denver to Nashville, the nearest point on the great lakes, with their cheap water transportation, is Chicago; the grain must come here. But this great region is poor in timber, though rich agriculturally. The nearest point to which the southward-moving lumber of the North can be brought by water is Chicago. Look at the map again. The great lakes extend far to the south of their outlet through the St. Lawrence, and the railroads which run from New York and Boston to Wisconsin, Minnesota, northern Iowa, the Dakotas, Montana, Oregon and the Puget Sound region—not to speak of the imperial domain of western Canada—must be gathered together like a sheaf at some point on the shore of Lake Michigan, where its waters block the direct path to the Northwest. There was but one point where this could occur—where the Chicago River furnished a harbor for the boats, and the Des Plaines water shed, with its fifteen-foot divide, afforded easy access to the "hinterland" for canoes, railroads, ship canals, etc. The jobbing trade of Chicago has been built up subject to strict geographic and topographic conditions. And Chicago's great strategic advantage of position is seen in this: That no matter what the form of transportation, whether by rail or by water, her position is equaly advantageous and equally commanding.

ADVISORY STAFF OF THE CENSUS DEPARTMENT.

Alma Mater is proud of her sons who have been serving as advisers to the census authorities upon the subject of the formulation of the inquiry schedules, writes a Washington correspondent. There are twelve of them, and they represent the University of Dakota, University of Wisconsin, Iowa Agricultural College, London School of Economics, University of Berlin, Cornell University, University of Nebraska, Harvard University, University of Texas, University of Chicago, University of Kansas, Columbia College, Massachusetts Institute of Technology, University of Vermont, Northwestern University, Dartmouth College, Carnegie Technology School, Brown University and Yale University. Among them are A. B.'s, Ph. D.'s, M. S.'s, B. S. C.'s, S. C.'s, B. S. A.'s, M. S. A.'s, A. B.'s, A. M.'s, Ph. B.'s, Ph. Facts For Sick Women

We know of no other medicine which has been so successful in relieving the suffering of women, or secured so many genuine testimonials, as has Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound.

In almost every community you will find women who have been restored to health by Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound. Almost every woman you meet has either been benefited by it, or knows some one who has.

In the Pinkham Laboratory at Lynn, Mass., are files containing over one million one hundred thousand letters from women seeking health, in which many openly state over their own signatures that they have regained their health by taking Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound.

Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound has saved many women from surgical operations.

Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound is made exclusively from roots and herbs, and is perfectly harmless.

The reason why it is so successful is because it contains ingredients which act directly upon the female organism, restoring it to healthy and normal activity.

Thousands of unsolicited and genuine testimonials such as the following prove the efficiency of this simple remedy.

Minneapolis, Minn.:—"I was a great sufferer from female troubles which caused a weakness and broken down condition of the system. I read so much of what Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound had done for other suffering women, I felt sure it would help me, and I must say it did help me wonderfully. Within three months I was a perfectly well woman.

"I want this letter made public to show the benefits to be derived from Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound."—Mrs. John G. Moldan, 2115 Second St. North, Minneapolis, Minn.

Women who are suffering from those distressing ills peculiar to their sex should not lose sight of these facts or doubt the ability of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound to restore their health.

Opening of Cheyenne River Indian Reservation in South Dakota

Registration Dates, Oct. 4 to 23, inclusive.

The General Land Office at Washington has designated Le Beau and Aberdeen, So. Dak., on the Minneapolis & St. Louis R. R. as registration points.

Le Beau, which is the Missouri River terminus of the Minneapolis & St. Louis R. R., is located on the Missouri River, opposite the Reservation, and is the nearest railroad station to three-fifths of the land.

Aberdeen, the other registration point, is the chief city in northern South Dakota.

These points are reached best by the Iowa Central and Minneapolis & St. Louis R. R. lines.

There will be about 14,000 quarter sections allotted to settlers. The land lays well for farming over most of the reservation. The soil is a light loam and is very fertile. It is similar to that in the counties east of the River, where the land sells from $25.00 to $30.00 per acre. Lignite coal is found over a great part of the reservation.

Who May Secure a Homestead—Under the homestead laws of the United States, any person, male or female who is not the owner of more than 160 acres of land in any state or territory, who is a native born citizen of the United States, or has been naturalized, or declared his intention to become a naturalized citizen of the United States (i.e., one who has taken out his first papers of citizenship), who is over the age of 21 years or the head of a family, may make a homestead entry of not exceeding 160 acres of any of the unoccupied lands of the United States.

THE WAGES OF CRIME.

Average Income of Those Who Profit by Violence and Bloodshed.

To formulate anything more than an approximate estimate of the cost of crime to the country at large would, of course, be a task almost impossible of accomplishment, for the reason that in country districts records are much more imperfectly kept, while the proportionate cost of crime is undoubtedly higher than for a large city. The cost of crime included in taxation in New York city is about $6 per capita of population, the highest in the country. In San Francisco it is estimated at about $5, and in other cities from $4 to $4.50.

It is probably well within the limits of safety to say that the total direct cost of crime to the country at large is about $600,000,000 or $700,000,000 annually. Criminal losses by fire last year totaled about $100,000,000, while the loss of wages of some 250,000 prisoners in State, city and county jails and prisons, amounted to something over $50,000,000. There are at present about 100,000 criminals confined in the State prisons of the country, and it is estimated that from 5 to 10 times as many more are successful in eluding the law. From statistics presented to the Prison Association of New York some years ago it has been ascertained that persons who follow crime as a business realize from their spoliation of the public $1,600 each per annum. When it is considered that the receivers of stolen goods get the lion's share of the profit, some idea is obtained of how great the cost to the community really is, and how small, comparatively, is the wages going to those who risk their freedom, even life itself, in following this mode of existence.

Benefits of Humus.

The substance left in the ground after the fertilizer has decayed is known as "humus." In order to secure the greatest results from the fertilizer and to get the largest possible quantity of humus, it is necessary that the soil be moist when the fertilizer is plowed under. Only a small amount of humus is obtained from the turned-under fertilizer should the ground be dry.

When the fertilizer is allowed to lie upon the surface for a period, exposed to the sun, much good is lost from the fact that it forms but a small amount of humus when plowed under. Therefore it is important that the soil should always be moist when fertilizer of any kind is plowed under.

In many ways humus benefits the soil. In the first place, it makes the soil lighter as well as looser. This condition allows good ventilation and gives a chance for poisonous gases to escape. The soil does not become overheated, and, in clay territory, the ground is lightened, making it more easy to work. It is equally beneficial in a sandy soil, inasmuch as it assists in binding it together, allowing more substance.

A Fireless Brooder.

If a hen can hatch a duckling, why can't a bunch of any sort of feathers hatch a chick? As a matter of fact, they can, as has been demonstrated by the fireless brooder invented by a California man. In general appearance the brooder resembles other machines of the kind, but there is no space in it for the lamp, or other heating apparatus used in the older types. Instead, a number of bunches of feathers are fastened to the under side of the lid. These feathers are just long enough to reach the floor of the box, with a little left over. The eggs are laid on the bottom, just beneath the feather tufts, and when the lid is closed each egg is inclosed in a cluster of down that makes a very good imitation hen. As each egg is hatched out the lid can be lifted for a second and the chick removed without the difficulty that would attend his removal from the old-style brooder, the interior of which is reached from one end.

Fat in Milk.

It can not be that the butter fat in milk is obtained from the fat stored in the tissues of the cow, otherwise the animal would soon become emaciated. Cows obtain the butter fat in milk from the food they eat and digest, and not from the reserve or accumulation of fat in their bodies. Reason as well as observation teaches that cows extract butter fat from the food they consume and digest, and to produce a large percentage of cream the rations of the cow should be rich in the elements of nitrogen and carbohydrates, which are found in linseed meal, middlings, bran, corn meal and ground oats. At the Cornell University cows that yielded 200 pounds of butter fat annually under ordinary feeding yielded 310 pounds when given liberal rations of feed rich in nitrogen and carbohydrates. Cream will not make butter unless it contains fat, and profitable fats will not be produced unless cows are fed on rations rich in the elements that produce cream.

Feeding Stalks to Hogs.

When the green stalks are given to hogs care should be taken to prevent cattle from having access to the woody fiber which the swine will leave after chewing the stalks. Pigs relish chewing the stalk for the sweetness in it, but leave enough saccharine matter in the fiber to make it attractive to cattle, especially the younger stock. This fiber is indigestible, and the cattle, if allowed to pick it up, will frequently eat a sufficient quantity to cause impaction and harmful if not fatal results. It is not safe to let the cattle into yards where swine are given green corn stalks.—Coburn's "Swine in America."

Angoras as Trail Cutters.

Angora goats are doing good work among the mountains of California, where they are cutting trails for fire guards through the brushy areas. The herd of 3,000 is divided into two bands, which are grazed within well-defined areas. They attack the heavy bushes, stripping off the bark and killing all wild growth. There is plenty of the same kind of work to be done in the East, but only small beginnings have been made. Perhaps an object lesson is needed in the shape of a large tract of rough land to be cleared and improved with the aid of the goats.

Changing Bees.

The common busy bees may be gradually replaced by the Italian or Cyprian varieties, by removing the old queen and substituting a new fertilized queen of either kind preferred. If she is carefully guarded in a small cage for a few days the bees soon recognize her, and in the course of a few months the old bees will all be dead and the new ones will be of the desired kind. The queen is compelled to lay numbers of eggs daily in order to supply the great loss constantly recurring by the destruction from birds, storms and other difficulties. There should be left plenty of honey for a winter supply, and the hives should be well protected from storms. What the beekeeper should aim to do is to sow such crops as will enable the bees to lay in a large supply of honey, and he can well afford to do so if he has a number of hives.

Killing Quack Grass.

A Michigan farmer gives these instructions for killing quack grass: Plow five or six inches deep in the growing season, say April, May and June. Give it a good digging, then cultivate with a cultivator that has teeth close enough so they will cut the roots two or two and one-half inches under the ground. The secret is to keep it from getting to the surface. It wants holding down six weeks. It does not take expensive tools. I use an old-fashioned cultivator that was bought fifty years ago. It has seven teeth, three in front, four in rear; each tooth cuts six inches wide. It is good to drag it over after three or four days. I cultivate once a week for six weeks; it has never failed me yet. The roots will be dead as hay. It is good for Canada thistles. If one is doubtful, take a rod or more square and keep it down for six weeks and see how it works. This was done with a hoe on two acres, and 100 bushels of smutnose corn were raised to the acre, planted in drills one foot apart and hoed to kill.

Digging Potatoes.

The time is near when farmers will be digging their potatoes, and then is the time to select the seed for another year; when a hill of nice, smooth potatoes is found, free from scab or rot, and a goodly number are just the shape and size wanted for table use, put them one side. At night gather them up and put them away for seed next spring. You will be surprised to see how you can change the type and improve them in a few years, says a Vermont contributor to the American Cultivator. We do this every year, and, while our townspeople are complaining of their potatoes running out and buying of us to renew their seed, we are planting potatoes (Green Mountains) that started from the seed that was bought for $5 a bushel when they first came around. If farmers would take as much pains in selecting their seed potatoes as they do their seed corn, we would not hear so much complaint about potatoes running out.

Rye as Horse Feed.

Rye is a good grain to feed horses. It is equal to oats and wheat, but it must be ground middling fine and mixed with cut straw or cut hay. The straw or hay should be cut into half-inch lengths, moistened with water and the rye meal well mixed with it. It is very sticky and horses cannot get the meal without eating the straw or hay with it. In feeding corn to horses we always grind half rye with the corn to make the corn meal stick to the cut straw. Corn and rye ground together in equal proportions and mixed with bright cut straw moistened with water make a well-balanced ration, equally as good, as eagerly sought after by horses and a cheaper horse feed than oats and hay.

Hogs and Straw Ricks.

Some farmers think that a straw rick is a good place for the sow and her brood to sleep. This is a mistake. It is best to keep them away from the straw pile winter and summer. In the winter the pigs will burrow beneath the straw, get too warm and take cold when they come out into the freezing atmosphere. Coughing and wheezing is the result, and the pigs do no good or die. Besides, if burrowed beneath the straw they are liable to be stepped on and seriously injured or killed by the stock running to the rick.

During the summer months especially should the sow and her young be fenced from the straw pile. If they burrow down into the half rotted straw they will be very apt to contract some disease.

Poultry Notes.

Others have built up an egg laying strain. Why not do so yourself?

Lazy hens cause much of the high prices for eggs. Make 'em get busy and hustle.

The warmer the weather the more water required, as more is thrown off by the body.

Many a hen that is otherwise well fed may fail to lay on account of lack of water.

Successful poultrymen, in order to keep their poultry on a paying basis, are continually culling their flocks.

One of the great values of green food, it is said, lies in its ability to aid in the digestion of other things.—Farm and Ranch.

Bad for the Boll Weevil.

Dr. W. D. Hunter, the government entomologist in charge of the Southern field crop, declares, in a bulletin issued at Dallas, that the recent period of oppressive heat in Texas played havoc with that hitherto invincible enemy of the planters, the boll weevil. Ninety-nine per cent of the cotton plant parasites, he says, are dead. The heat not only dealt death among the boll weevil, but at the same time forced a process of incubation in the cotton bolls. The result will be a crop that may be harvested earlier than usual.

Grades of Cream.

The Kansas Agricultural College grades cream as follows: First grade cream, 30 or more per cent of butter fat; second grade, 25 per cent and less than 30; third grade, having less than 25 per cent butter fat. Creameries like to get high-testing cream, say 30 and above. They make more butter from this, as the overrun is greater.

Movable Schools.

The United States Department of Agriculture recommends the establishment of movable schools of agriculture by the state experiment stations. Where fifteen farmers can be secured as students the school may be conducted for a year or longer. The kind of instruction will depend upon the needs of the section.

TOTAL LOSS OF HAIR

Seemed Imminent—Scalp Was Very Scaly and Hair Came Out by Handfuls—Scalp Now Clear and New Hair Grown by Cuticura.

"About two years ago I was troubled with my head being scaly. Shortly after that I had an attack of typhoid fever and I was out of the hospital possibly two months when I first noticed the loss of hair, my scalp being still scaly. I started to use dandruff cures to no effect whatever. I had actually lost hope of saving any hair at all. I could brush it off my coat by the handful. I was afraid to comb it. But after using two cakes of Cuticura Soap and nearly a box of Cuticura Ointment, the change was surprising. My scalp is now clear and healthy as could be and my hair thicker than ever, whereas I had my mind made up to be bald. W. F. Steese, 5812 Broad St., Pittsburg, Pa., May 7 and 21, 1908."

No Honey Factory.

"That was an error," said Senator Beveridge, apropos of an opponent's argument at a dinner in Indianapolis. "Our friend made an embarrassing error. He reminds me of John Winslow. He spent his honeymoon at Niagara. He left the bridal apartment late one night to bathe and on his return knocked, as he supposed, on his wife's door, calling softly:

"'Honey!'

"There was no answer. Winslow knocked again.

"'Honey!'

"Still no answer. Winslow thundered on the door.

"'Honey!' he cried in a voice of agony.

"Then a reply came at last.

"'Sneak, you blooming idiot!' a male voice growled. This is a bedroom, not a blooming beehive.'"

WISHED DEATH MIGHT COME

To Relieve the Awful Suffering of Advanced Kidney Disease.

William Gibson, Greenup, Ky., says: "Three months I was in bed, and would have died, I believe, but for Doan's Kidney Pills. My doctor said the case was hopeless. My back felt as if it were being seared with a red-hot iron. The kidney secretions were painful, irregular and full of sediment. There were puffy spots beneath my eyes and my head pained terribly. I was miserable in every way and often wished death might relieve me. When I began taking Doan's Kidney Pills my condition was so serious that they had little effect, but I persisted, getting gradually better, and it was not a great while before I was cured. The effect has been lasting."

Remember the name—Doan's. Sold by all dealers. 50 cents a box. Foster-Milburn Co., Buffalo, N. Y.

Bottle Suicide.

Drunkenness for deepest troubles is often a preventive or a substitute for suicide, a "temporary suicide" as it were. Many men too cowardly to pull the trigger or take gas, deliberately and viciously commit suicide by the slow alcoholic route, and even say it is an easy way to die. And for this alcohol gets the blame.—Exchange.

In case of pain on the lungs Hamlins Wizard Oil acts like a mustard plaster, except that it is more effective and is so much nicer and cleaner to use.

"You say your dirigible balloon is a success?"

"Yes," answered the inventor.

"But it came down to the earth with a terrible bump."

"True. But it hit very close to the spot I was aiming at."

Good Housekeepers Use the Best.

That's why they use Red Cross Ball Blue. At leading grocers, 5 cents.

All in Good Time.

"I'm sure I don't know why they call this hotel The Palms. Do you? I've never seen a palm anywhere near the place."

When You Think

Of the pain which many women experience with every month it makes the gentleness and kindness always associated with womanhood seem to be almost a miracle. While in general no woman rebels against what she regards as a natural necessity there is no woman who would not gladly be free from this recurring period of pain.

Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription makes weak women strong and sick women well, and gives them freedom from pain. It establishes regularity, subdues inflammation, heals ulceration and cures female weakness.

Sick women are invited to consult Dr. Pierce by letter, free. All correspondence strictly private and sacredly confidential. Write without fear and without fee to World's Dispensary Medical Association, R. V. Pierce, M. D., President, Buffalo, N. Y.

If you want a book that tells all about woman's diseases, and how to cure them at home, send 21 one-cent stamps to Dr. Pierce to pay cost of mailing only, and he will send you a free copy of his great thousand-page illustrated Common Sense Medical Adviser—revised, up-to-date edition, in paper covers. Only Partly True.

She had been at the seaside and in the country all the summer, and her industrious fiance had been working and waiting for her during the long long days.

Now she had returned, and he had been hearing many things of her and was sore displeased.

"They tell me," he said, painfully "that you flirted desperately with no fewer than six men this summer."

Her cheeks flushed and her eyes blazed.

"Who told you that?" she asked, angrily.

"Several people. It has been common talk."

Her anger gave way to sobs.

"Oh, Frank," she pleaded, as she flung herself on his neck, "it isn't true—it isn't true."

A great load was lifted from his heart.

"No, Frank," she went on, "it isn't true; there were only four."

Consistent.

"Senator, may I ask what you really think of the new tariff?"

"As to that, young man, I must refer you to my record."

"But you haven't any record, Senator. You voted on both sides of the question."

"Then I should probably talk on both sides of it. Good morning."

LURED BY CALL OF THE WILD.

Pittsburg Heiress Plays Role of Real Hobo After Quitting Home.

Alienists who have been called into consultation are unable to explain the wanderlust that has obsessed Miss Mary Patterson, a wealthy young society girl. She was taken into custody at Waukesha, Wis., after a period of wandering since Thanksgiving day.

During her nine months' absence the girl, plentifully supplied with money from her father's estate, scorned the comforts and the luxury of Pullman and dining cars and chose the favored abode of every real hobo—the box car, well filled with damp excelsior, and a bandout whenever it could be procured.

There were no real home troubles to explain her wanderings, the New York World's Pittsburg correspondent says. Mrs. Mary Patterson, the girl's mother, is a woman of wealth and unquestioned society position, as well as being an indulgent parent. The only explanation the alienists have is that the lure of the road called the girl and she answered.

The estate of her father was settled several days before Thanksgiving day. The girl was at her home the morning of that day, but when she was called to dinner there was no response. She had departed for parts unknown.

For months no trace of the girl could be discovered, although detective agencies were employed in the case. Recently, however, Mrs. Patterson received a long-distance call. The voice of her daughter could be plainly distinguished. The girl sent her love to the family, but refused to give them any information as to her whereabouts. Inquiries at the telephone exchange proved that the message came from Chicago.

Then the girl appeared in Waukesha and registered at the Springs City Hotel as M. E. Graham of Clinton, Iowa. The attention of the hotel attaches was attracted to the young woman by her peculiar actions, among them being a propensity for sleeping on the floor of her room and bringing up food from the dining hall to eat cold.

When the police were notified Miss Patterson disappeared. Search by the authorities was instituted, and the girl was found prowling about the Milwaukee yards seeking a convenient box car. She was taken in custody and imprisoned in the home of the sheriff.

Miss Patterson was indignant and demanded her release. Later she attempted to escape. Asked as to her identity and residence, she refused to make any statement, but during the questioning mentioned the name of Dr. Seip of Pittsburg. Through him her mother was notified. Force was necessary to compel her return to Pittsburg.

TREES IN ALL SHAPES.

They May Be Made to Fit Any Space or to Take Any Form.

An expert can make a vine of an apple or a pear tree, a tree of gooseberry or currant bush, or a snake of either, says Country Life in America. He will twist, pinch and fondle the descendant of some mighty apple tree, with its gnarled branches and its forty-foot spread, measuring, planning and nursing until, instead of assuming the shape of its parent, it will grow to fit some space on the side of his house, hugging the wall like a vine, or possibly will form a screen to hide his kitchen porch.

In the rich man's garden abroad we see all sorts of curious forms to which fruit trees have been trained. Some are beautiful, some are freakish, but all are wonderful. In vases, lyres, shields, crests, monograms, soldiers, beautiful maidens the apple or pear tree and the currant bush lose their identity.

Those that are trained like vines certainly possess a distinctive decorative value. In the old days every estate in England worth while had a specimen box tree—a superior example of topiary work—which was pruned to resemble Queen Elizabeth.

In the poor man's garden abroad a trained fruit tree finds its greatest usefulness. No garden is too small for a few trees. The peasant, with a scant six inches or a foot between his walk and his neighbor's fence, still has room to plant a tree and train it against a lattice. While the necessity for maximum returns from minimum acres is not a part of our national point of view, the possibility of the training of trees as a hobby has been very much overlooked.

In Germany you can buy a tree to measure to fill in any space on your garden wall or house, just as we buy a ready-made suit of clothes. While the training of fruit trees has become popular only within ten years, the Formobstbaumschulen, or schools where trees are trained, are now to be found everywhere in Germany. There are commercial nurseries where experts in espalier work are constantly making new forms and creating new marvels. Certain shapes have become standard, such as pyramids, cordons, palmettos and so on.

There are practically no nurseries in America that have taken up the propagation and sale of trained fruit trees in a serious way, and there is almost no American literature on the subject; consequently one who wishes to take this work as a hobby will be forced to Germany, France or England for his inspiration and for his stock.

Heroic Remedies.

"According to this magazine," said Mrs. Biffingham, "sliced onions scattered about a room will absorb the odor of fresh paint."

"I guess that's right," rejoined Biffingham. "Likewise a broken neck will relieve a man of catarrh!"—London Answers.

An Epigram.

This $1000.00 Cup for an ear of Corn

Made by Tiffany. Nearly 3 ft. high—in solid gold and silver. Actual contract price $1,000. To be awarded at the National Corn Exposition, Omaha December 6 to 18, 1909

to the man, woman or child producing the best ear of corn grown this year in the United States.

Open to everybody belonging to the Association—Nothing to buy or sell.

The purpose of the donor of this trophy—W. K. Kellogg—is to improve the quality of the millions of bushels of corn used in making Kellogg's Toasted Corn Flakes.

Many people think the perfection of corn flavor has been reached in Toasted Corn Flakes. Perhaps it has. If you don't know how good Kellogg's — the genuine Toasted Corn Flakes—is, try it. Then you'll see how hard a task we are giving ourselves to improve it, and the only way we can improve it is by the betterment of the corn itself.

Professor Holden, of the Iowa State College, the greatest authority on corn in the world, will award the prize at the National Corn Exposition, to be held at Omaha, Neb., Dec. 6th to 18th, 1909. Two simple rules will govern the plan, and they are—that you send your best ear of corn to the National Corn Exposition, Omaha, Neb., before November 27, 1909, and that you are a member of the National Corn Association—full particulars regarding which can be had by writing to National Corn Exposition, Omaha, Neb. Tie a tag securely to your specimen and word it, "For the Kellogg Trophy Contest," and write your name and address plainly. If yours is judged the best, you will get the trophy for 1910. If you succeed again next year or the year following, the trophy will become your property for all time.

The contest will be open to every state in the Union. Professor Holden will judge the corn particularly on the basis of quality. The growing of more corn per acre is one object of the award, but the main purpose of the founder of the trophy is for improving the quality of corn used in making KELLOGG'S TOASTED CORN FLAKES. If you haven't tried this delicious cereal, begin your education in "good things to eat" today. All grocers have it.

Can't Learn in School

When the stomach is out of order or the bowels constipated, a feeling of drowsiness and inactivity comes over the body. The brain won't think, and the body won't work. If it is a child who suffers in this way, it naturally can't learn well in school, as it has no inclination for study. Give the child a dose of Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin and you will soon find it wonderfully improved and ultimately cured. It is guaranteed to do what is claimed, and if you want to try it before buying, send your address for a free sample bottle to Pepsin Syrup Co., 119 Caldwell Bldg., Monticello, Ill. It is sold by all druggists at 50c and $1 a bottle. 39-1m

THE HUNGER FOR LAND

Measures of the Government to Appease the Appetites for Farms.

A Wonderful Exhibit by the Departments of the Interior and Agriculture at the United States Land and Irrigation Exposition at Chicago from Nov. 20th to Dec. 4th.

A debt of gratitude and a vote of thanks will be due the Chicago Tribune from the American people when the United States Land and Irrigation Exposition is over. The inception of this great undertaking was entirely due to the Tribune. The idea originated with the Tribune, and the entire responsibility, financial and otherwise, was assumed by the Tribune.

So timely did this enterprise seem to be that all the great irrigation and other land interests were quickly won and promised their participation and support. The United States government has thought so well of the Tribune's idea that it will be the largest exhibitor.

All the exhibits of the exposition will deal with the idea of establishing American homes upon small farms. All the features of this unique and wonderful show will be pivoted around the idea that the best place for an American family is in a home of its own, and that home a tract of land large enough to maintain the family in any emergency. With our better knowledge of plants and soils and cultural practice a few acres have an astonishing capacity for production. Valuable instruction along these lines will be found by the visitor at the coming exposition, Nov. 20 to Dec. 4, at Chicago's great Coliseum.

Besides the features specially prepared and brought from Washington, the best features from the government's exhibit at Seattle will be installed at Chicago. The reclamation service, the geological survey, the land office, the forestry service, the patent office, the bureau of animal industry, the bureau of plant industry, the weather bureau, the office of experiment stations and the bureau of entomology will all participate in a manner worthy of the government of eighty millions of people.

The value of the government exhibits to the visitor will lie in the fact that they are new and represent the latest thought and development in the various lines which they represent. All will relate to irrigation, drainage, dry farming and to the industries of the farm, especially of the new farms which are being reclaimed from what has long been regarded as waste land.

THE BIG LAND SHOW

Chicago's Chief of Police Assures Visitors That Everything Will Be Ready for Their Comfort.

Chief of Police Steward of Chicago is mindful of the comfort of visitors during the coming Land Exposition, which will be held during the same time as the International Live Stock Show, Nov. 20 to Dec. 4.

"We shall not only police the exposition, but also all those parts of the city which the visitors will frequent. If there are any suspicious characters in sight, we shall speedily warn them to leave the city. We are determined that our guests during the exposition season shall be as free from annoyance as a thoroughly organized police and detective force can make them. Ordinarily the stranger in Chicago is as safe here as in any city—we purpose to make him doubly so during the two weeks of the exposition and Live Stock Show. We have on the force many men who are experienced in looking after large crowds and they will all be on duty at the right points during the Land and Irrigation festivities.

"I am taking a special interest in this coming land show, for I realize its great importance to the country and to the city of Chicago, and I appreciate the earnestness of the people who are going to be Chicago's visitors. Many people who are seeking new locations for their homes will come to Chicago and many of them will not be on the alert for suspicious characters. To such people we shall give especial care and do all in the power of our strong organization to see that no one falls into the hands of the confidence men or other swindlers during his presence within our gates.

"I appreciate the enterprise of the Chicago Tribune in promoting and financing this great exposition and it is my wish to have our police organization assume a large measure of the responsibility for the comfort of our guests on this splendid occasion."

Heredity.

"It's too bad that Gladys Miggles is such a silly sort of girl. She is pretty enough, but she acts so foolish that she seems a perfect ninny. What is the reason for it?" asks the party of the first part.

"It's simply enough explained," answers the party of the second part "Her mother was a dress reformer and her father was a rock-the-boat idiot." —Chicago Post.

I would not take all the money in the world for what it did for my boy." Infallible for Coughs and Colds, its the safest, surest cure of desperate Lung diseases on earth. 50c and $1 00 at Stone's drug store. Guarantee satisfaction. Trial bottle free. 39-1m

VOLUME XL — BUTLER, DEKALB COUNTY, INDIANA, FRIDAY, NOV. 5, 1909 — NUMBER 44

D. W. WEITZ, Pres. H. M. SHOWALTER, Vice Pres. WALTER SNIDER, Cashier

The First National Bank

BUTLER, INDIANA

DEAR SIR:

We are writing you soliciting your having a bank account with this bank. You have never before had the opportunity of doing business with a National Bank in Butler. We are doing a safe and sound banking business and we would like to have you do business with us.

Bring you checks or money in and get one of our pass books and a check book Put what you take in, in the bank and when you want to pay anybody anything write them a check for the amount instead of paying them the money.

You do not need any more money than you already have to do your business through the bank. It is simply paying your bills through the bank. We pay your checks as long as your money lasts.

We keep your books for you, and you know just where every cent you take in and pay out goes to and you have a receipt for everything you pay out.

If you need more money than you have we always loan money to our depositors first.

Any business done in this bank is absolutely confidential.

Respectfully Yours,

WALTER SNIDER, Cashier.

N. B. I hope you will give this matter your earnest consideration.

SCHOOL NOTES

Pithy Paragraphs From Our Public Schools

SENIOR NOTES

There will be a debate at the high school building, Nov. 12, at 7:30 p. m. The subject for debate is "Should the Honor System Be Generally Adopted in High School Examinations." Affirmative—Ethel Higley, Helen Garber and Mr. Austin. Negative—John Blaker, Grace Murch and Rhea Holtzberg.

The Seniors have finished the study of "Macbeth" and have taken up "Macauley's Essays on Addison and Johnson."

Miss Helen Garber was absent Tuesday afternoon.

Miss Ethel Higley was absent Monday.

Mr. Austin says the Seniors are prompt about paying their dues—but My! those Sophomores!

Many were absent from school Friday afternoon on account of the football game.

Mr. Austin says the note writers do not succeed in looking natural after the deed is done.

It seems so hard for the "Freshies" to get "on to" the ways of the B. H. S. Give them time.

The Physics class has been studying about Molecules and Atoms.

A Senior—"Oh, that English makes me laff!"

JUNIOR NOTES

We did not know until recently that the B. H. S. was composed partly of "Jumping Jacks."

(Miss A. to the fourth year English class)—"Class, your answers actually make me laugh."

Harmon Parker was absent Monday.

Last Thursday the superintendent of the Edgerton high school phoned to Mr. B. and challenged the B. H. S. to a game of foot ball. To the great surprise of the scholars he accepted. So that evening after school a team was organized, and with an hour of swift practice were ready to meet the E. H. S. Tigers. The next afternoon both teams, which were about even as to weight, appeared on the field and until the middle of the last half neither side scored. Finally the Tigers with great difficulty crowded the ball over the goal line which determined the game in their favor. It was a clean game and each player conducted himself as a gentleman.

Every month there is a new method adopted for studying history.

FRESHMEN NOTES

(C. P.)—"Mr. President, I move that we adjourn."

(Pres. D. B.)—"It has been moved that we rejoice. Let's rejoice."

Oh, those algebra tests! Of course we all have perfect papers.

The Freshmen have at last been divided among the two literary societies.

Really it is hard for Mr. A. to convince B. W. and V. C. that they are not to study with the persons sitting back of them.

The Freshies don't wear five or six rats and a ton of false hair, so we all know Mr. A.'s remarks are not intended for us.

Prof. B. says the Juniors have infantile minds. Poor things!

Miss Fern Graves, of Fayette, Ohio, was a B. H. S. visitor last Friday.

Lester Firestone and Loren Bryant were absent Friday afternoon.

Book reports for outside reading are due this week.

This is the beginning of a new month and we are anxiously awaiting our grade cards.

DEMOCRATS POLL LARGE MAJORITY

The Old Wheel Horse, Sam G. Stone, Leads His Ticket Wit' Walter Mondhank As a Close Second

EVEN DEMOCRATS SURPRISED

When Wards Report Enthusiasm Runs High

The wise old rooster who foretells the coming of day and warns the inhabitants of the barnyard of an approaching storm, has cause to be proud of the support accorded him in this, the liveliest city campaign ever held in the history of Butler.

The candidates of both parties are to be congratulated upon the honest and earnest way in which they did their work. All were busy working for their respective tickets and yet keeping in the bounds of truth and veracity.

Each man was elected upon his own merits, and without besmearching the reputation of his opponent The defeated candidates are taking their defeat like gentlemen, and some of them will no doubt be in line and stand a very good show for the next election by proving that they are men of honor and can take a defeat with grace.

As shown in the tabulated result of the vote the democrats cleared the platter (with the help of the republicans) taking the mayor, clerk, treasurer and three councilmen, leaving one councilman at large and one ward councilman for the republicans.

It is no small task to fill a public office to the satisfactory of the entire community, in fact that set of men have never been found. The old board has been criticised somewhat, but perhaps to at least a great extent unjustly. A great many good, honest people do not realize what it means to fill an office of this kind and often find fault with men who are acting conscientiously and to the best of their ability endeavoring to please their constituents. This may be applied to both the outgoing and incoming boards. We feel that the men to have charge of the municipal affairs for the next four years are men of executive ability and men who will strive at all times to protect the welfare of the city of Butler. As to how well they will succeed remains to be seen. The HERALD hopes and expects to see a conservative, progressive in administration.

The preliminary work for paving three or four streets is now underway by the present council and no doubt will be carried out by the new board where it is left off by their predecessors. This was before the voters and it was well understood who were in favor of such improvements. Paving is a necessary in Butler, and while Auburn is "tapping" the taxpayers of the county for a new court house, let Butler keep some of the money at home and pave her streets.

TWO MORE TRAINS

A Positive Fact That the Vandalia Co. Will Put On More Passenger Trains---New Schedule to Take Effect November 7

A special train carrying Supt. F. H. Worthington and the division officials went over the Vandalia road Tuesday on a tour of inspection. While here Supt. Worthington made public the statement that the Vandalia Railroad company would put two more passenger trains on the road, the new schedule to go into effect November 7. The west bhund will pass through here about nine o'clock in the morning and the east bound after six in the evening. The exact time is not yet decided for the morning train. It may pass the present east bound here or east of here. If it passes here the schedule time will be 8:39; if east of here, it will reach South Whitley at nine. The time card will probably give an east bound at 8:39 a. m. and 6:20 p. m. and a west bound at 9:00 a. m. and 5:14 p. m. The exact time will be made known later.

These trains, Supt. Worthington stated, will be put on and run at a loss of thousands of dollars to the company. They will be used because the locals have been found to be very unsatisfactory to the public, and they will be run until it is known whether or not gasoline motor cars can be operated successfully. The Pennsylvania company have been investigating the possibility of using these cars and the investigations have not yet been concluded. The company has found them successful in many respects and will probably decide to use them. They have at present the price of the cars, but have not reached the point where they know what the running expenses will be between Logansport and Butler.

Whatever the Vandalia company may decide to do in the matter of the kind of car used does not concern the public so much as the fact that there will be more cars. The passenger service derived from the locals has been far more satisfactory and although there may not be so many passengers on this division, those who do go will feel thankful for passenger cars. They will then have the satisfaction of knowing when they can leave town and when they will return, besides having the pleasure of riding on a better train. After the service Whitley county has had the past few months any change will be accepted with pleasure.—Whitley County News.

FRED SHOWALTER HALLOWE'EN VICTIM

Received Bad Wound But Will Recover--Hotel Proprietor Under $500 Bond.

At least two families of Butler will remember Hallowe'en of 1909, when Fred Showalter was severely shot in the left leg by A. W. Ware, proprietor of the Cottage hotel of this city.

Young Showalter, together with several other young fellows of about his age, were out for a time. They had secured a small building and were carrying it down Broadway. When they got in front of the Cottage hotel Ware came out of his office and without warning or saying a word fired into the crowd, the shot taking effect in the left leg of young Showalter who dropped to the ground and was picked up and carried into the Waverly hotel by his companions where he was cared for by Dr. L. H. Harrison and later was removed to his home one-half mile north of town. Ware after shooting returned to his office. He remained at home until Sunday afternoon when a rig was procured and he was driven to Edgerton where he was arrested by the marshal and held until officers from Butler came and took charge of him. He was brought back and placed in the city jail until Monday when he was given a hearing before Justice of the Peace Webster and in default of the bonds which was placed at $500 was placed in the county jail. On Wednesday a number of citizens signed his bond and secured his releas.

The victim of the shooting will undoubtedly get well, but will carry through life an ugly scar as the wound is a bad one. The charge entered the calf of his leg and passed up into the thigh, tearing the flesh in shreds.

It is a very unfortunate affair, not only for the two families, but it places a stigma upon the city which will take months to blot out, especially if all the newspapers in the country write it up in the yellow journalistic style which the Auburn Courier has started. The HERALD does not wish to conceal the plain facts in the matter, but it is being greatly overdrawn by some of the newspapers.

Notice

I understand that on Sunday and Monday of this week, it was reported and told to nearly all the people of Butler that Mr. Ware had asked me for police protection and I had refused to grant his request. Now as a matter of fact I have not seen Mr. Ware to speak with him since last July, and he never made any such demand or request of me in any way whatever.

I selected Mr. Fulmer, Mr. Livergood and Mr. Fridenberger as extra police for Saturday night last, and these, together with the marshal and night watchman in my opinion should have been ample protection to the people of the town, and their property. There were a great many lies circulated not only to harm me, but other officers of the town, by whom started I do not know, but believe they were told with malicious intent, and for the purpose of deceiving the people. So far as the office of mayor, I did not want it, as it has been quite an injury to me in a business way and feel greatly relieved to know my term will soon expire.

Mr. Mondhank has always been a friend of mine, and I believe him to be a gentleman in all respects, that he is capable of filling the office with honor to himself and to the best interests of the city, and hope the people may stand by him, instead of trying to pick flaws in his administration, or by circulating unfounded reports as actual truths.

WALLACE C. WEBSTER, Mayor.

ALL A DREAM.

When you've sung all the songs, lad,
When you've played all the tunes,
And mixed with all the throngs, lad,
And mastered all the runes
Of life—lived through the shadow days,
And lived through days of gloom
And when at last death's shadow strays
Toward you 'twill seem a dream.

'Twill seem a dream, the battle fought,
Perhaps you failed to gain,
The goal so passionately sought
Through years of toil and pain;
The empty task, the sordid round,
Life's coronal of thorns,
The happiness you've never found,
The faith a cynic scorns.

'Twill seem a dream—'tis better so,
And when you stand at last
And wait the call, prepared to go
Where those before have passed,
That hour with so much anguish weighed
For all the human band
Will find you calm and not afraid
To face the shadow land.

A Case of Repentance

The particular beat I was patrolling, one night in November, was a series of streets where offices, banks and chambers were pretty thickly crowded together. All were in darkness, for the hour was beyond midnight; I was calculating on another hour's strolling back and forth, without incident or excitement, when suddenly I came to an involuntary halt. "Hallo!" I said, half aloud.

In one of the offices I had seen a light, the very faintest twinkle and glimmer of a light, and only for a moment. Yet I swore it was a light, although for a space I stood weighing the probability that it might have been a reflection from some street lamp, which had momentarily sprung into being at the angle at which I had caught sight of it. To make sure on this point, I went back a dozen paces on the pavement, gazing on the plate-glass window as I moved. No reflection repeated itself, and I approached the window and hauled myself up on the wide sill. Listening, I heard the faintest of tappings—a rap-a-tap, rap-a-tap—that suggested blows from a muffled hammer. I dropped down again to the street, meditating.

To sound my whistle would have been to alarm the fellow at work within; to run for help might have been to find him gone when I returned. I crept to the door and tried it gently, but it did not yield. The name plate revealed the fact that the place was a bank. I whistled softly as I realized that I was in for an adventure.

"REPENTED, HAVE YOU."

I went round to the rear of the premises, opened a yard door, looked round cautiously for a dog, ventured to lift the latch of a back door which led into a kitchen and—found it open. On the spur of the moment I decided to enter and tackle the burglar single-handed.

Sitting down on the step, I drew off my boots, grasped my truncheon and groped a way toward the front of the premises. The rap-a-tap guided me. The door of the room where the man was at work was slightly ajar; I peeped through the chink and saw him on his knees behind the bank counter. He was working at a safe, I saw, with the aid of a dark lantern.

"Hallo!" I said quietly, from the center of the floor, at the same instant turning my bull's-eye full on him.

The fellow sprang to his feet quickly enough. He was of the top-hatted class, with a long black coat with fancy tails, high collar and horseshoe scarf pin. His face was very red as he faced me. He gaped across toward the door by which I had entered, then he blurted out: "Are—are you alone?"

The next moment I had flown to the street door and was wrestling with the fastening—egress to the street would provide me with a way of escape, if necessary. But the bolts and things were a bit of a puzzle—perhaps designedly so—and the thief had leapt the counter and was upon me before I had made much progress. He caught me by the shoulder and jerked me round, but I had him on the floor a minute later. Pinning his arms to his side I called on him to surrender.

"And what if I don't?" said he.

"I'll use my truncheon. In a case of this sort, you know——"

"All right. Let me get up, and I'll explain."

"No fear. You may have firearms."

"'Pon my honor, there's nothing in my pockets more dangerous than a lead pencil."

Whereupon I felt him up and down, rubbing my hands across his pockets. Convinced that he spoke the truth, I let him get up. Standing back in the gloom, I kept his form in the glare of the bull's-eye at my belt.

"You wont believe me, constable," he said, falling back limply into a chair, "but I'm the manager of this bank."

I grunted. "Banks don't want no managing in the middle of the night," I said.

"Don't they? That's all you know about it. I do most of my thinking in the small hours. But, to come to the point—ten days ago I stole a matter of £500 from the safe over there. I've been in a fearful state of remorse and terror ever since, and to-night I'm replacing the money, see?"

I grunted again. I don't know what to make of it.

"Constable, in a case of this kind you wouldn't be hard on a chappie. I've got a wife and child and—something of a reputation. My career is clear henceforward the very moment I get off these premises."

"Repented, have you?" I asked suspiciously.

"Repented!" He threw out his hands. "That's too flippant a word, constable. I've simply been in agony. I know what it is to have the worst horrors of the infernal regions about my bed by night, and the awful dread of suspicious eyes around my desk every hour of the day. I was beginning to see the blessed light again—a few more minutes and I should have done it!—light and ease and joy and freedom were on the very threshold!"

"You've mistaken your profession, sir," I laughed. "You ought to have been a preacher."

"Perhaps I shall be, presently. The impulse is strong in me to go about warning all other poor tempted fellows. Say, constable, you've got a child or two of your own, eh?"

"Um, yes; one or two, as you say."

"One of 'em's called Polly, I bet?"

"Good guess. Her name happens to be Mary, but it's near enough."

"Well, I've got a 'Mary.' When I've handed you £5, constable, as a sort of memento of this incident, we'll clear up the mess and get off home again, eh? My Mary is waiting for me now; she'll be in a terrible fright till I get back.'

The Pollies and Marys of this world have been guilty of melting men's hearts before now, and the man's talk about his Mary softened me. He was cute enough to count out five sovereigns and hand them to me before the clearing-up operations began. After which I helped him with a will, and was very civil and obliging while doing it. He kept on talking about his remorse and his hopes for the future, in a way that nearly made me weep; I told him I had never before been in the company of a genuine penitent, and was glad of the experience.

I felt so kindly toward him, indeed, and was so pleased to think he was out of the wood, that I volunteered to carry his bag on leaving. After I had put on my boots we crept out through the back yard, and at the end of the alley behind he relieved me of the bag and left me with a final word of gratitude.

I watched him out of sight. Then I grew sensible—by degrees. Why had the man carried a heavy bag in departing? While I had been "clearing-up" he had been stowing things into it with startling celerity. Why had he used chisel and hammer?—a bank manager would have been in possession of keys!

I grew hot and cold in turn; by the time I was relieved by the sergeant I had made up my mind to say nothing about the matter. But the five pounds seemed to be burning a hole in my pocket.

It turned out that the burglar was one of the most expert and resourceful bank thieves of that time, his story was a clever ruse that put me off the scent, and even pressed me into his service. He got clear away with practically the entire contents of the bank coffers—with the exception of the one solitary safe at which he was working when I disturbed him—and I had helped him to carry the plunder the first hundred yards. I was a raw beginner then, and doubtless came within an ace of disgrace and dismissal, but the experience of that night proved a tremendous spur to my wits—which is perhaps one reason why today I am one of the crack detectives of the service.—Philadelphia Telegraph.

DR. COOK IN COPENHAGEN.

EXPLORER ADDRESSING THE SCIENTISTS.

While Dr. Cook, the Arctic explorer, was in Copenhagen, a brilliant ceremony took place at the university, when the degree of honorary doctor was conferred upon him. Fully 1,200 persons were present, including many famous explorers and scientists. Dr. Cook entered the festival hall in a grand procession, in which walked the Crown Prince, the Princess Valdemar, Prince and Princess George of Greece, Prof. Jorp, rector of the university, and members of the American Embassy. A speech highly eulogistic of Dr. Cook was made by Prof. Warming, and the audience cheered for fully five minutes when the rector of the university presented the diploma. In his reply Dr. Cook, for the first time since his arrival, betrayed a touch of emotion, when he exclaimed, after stating what he would do to prove his case: "And I will show you my hand!" Wild enthusiasm again broke out, and the Crown Prince and all the distinguished persons shook hands with the explorer.

AN ARBOR-DAY IDYL.

Every human activity may be considered from the esthetic as well as the practical point of view. No especial powers of discrimination are needed to enable the reader of this extract from the Chicago Ledger to determine where to place each of the two men whose conversation is reported.

The man with the benignant countenance framed in side-whiskers came to a stop and spoke genially to the sturdy fellow who was planting the tree on the lawn.

"Ah," he said, "yours, my friend, is a noble task."

"How iss it?" inquired the husky individual.

"Yours is a noble task. Now, when all nature is sear and disconsolate, you are looking forward to the coming season of sunshine and flowers, and are doing what you may to beautify and gladden the earth."

"It dake a vagon-load of r-rich eart' for de hole vare diss dree go."

"Yes, yes. Just so. I was speaking metaphorically, so to speak. I was referring to the time when this umbrageous verdure should——"

"Diss isn't dot kind of a tree. Diss iss a moundain-ash."

"Very true. And a beautiful species it is, I have no doubt. How splendid it is to realize that one may be a humble instrument in the furtherance of the plans for making glad the waste places! In years to come you will journey, perchance, to this spot and gaze upon the towering monarch of the forest which shall arise from the shrub you are planting, and to your soul will come the cheering knowledge that it was your hands that made it possible. Even next year you will come here, no doubt, and——"

"Yess. I gome next year unt pull der dree ouid again if der feller don'd seddle his pill. He iss slow pay."

Place for the Simple Life.

"If I wanted to dream my life away I would go to New Caledonia, the French penal colony," says Major W. J. Collins of London, a celebrated mining engineer, formerly a resident of this country, according to the Washington Post. "That is a country where one can be content to sit and dream. There is only one other place I know of that can equal it, and that is Ceylon in India.

"I spent several years in New Caledonia, where the French government has some 4,000 life prisoners. Many of these convicts have no hope of ever leaving their prison island, although there have been hundreds of attempts to escape for risking their lives in an effort to get away, for they have little to do but to wait for death, and it is a sad commentary that the French government officials have little regard for the prisoners. These convicts are of different classes, of course.

"The seven-year men in reality have to remain fourteen years on the island. Seven years are passed as convicts in the strict sense of the word and the other seven as ticket of leave men. That is, they have to report every month or two to the prison officials. Men who are sentenced for eight years never have any hope of leaving New Caledonia; they are there for life.

"Most of the attempts to escape have resulted in loss of life, because it is almost an impossibility to get away in safety. The men who tried to escape used small canoes or boats, but in nearly all cases these craft were wrecked before the occupants reached land."

A graft by any other name is just as apt to land some men behind the bars.

Little Laughs

The Only Reason.

A keen golfer, but middling player, who was paying his annual visit to a certain seaside course, remarked to his caddie:

"By the way, I played a round with Tom McGregor the last time I was here. Grand player, McGregor!"

"Aye," said the caddie, "but ye could bate McGregor noo."

"Do you think so?" exclaimed the gratified visitor, well aware of the McGregor prowess.

"Aye," drawled the caddied, "McGregor's deid."—Tit-Bits.

An Easy Way Out.

"Here you," said the conductor, angrily, "you rang up a fare. Do that again and I'll put you off."

The small man standing in the middle of the crowded car promptly rang up another fare. Thereupon the conductor projected him through the crowd and to the edge of the platform.

"Thanks," said the little man. "I did not see any other way to get out. Here's your dime."—Success Magazine.

OLD-FASHIONED MOTHER.

Neither Follies of Fashion Nor Social Doings Worry Her.

There aren't as many old-fashioned mothers nowadays, just as there aren't as many middle-aged women. Our mothers are very dear, no doubt, and very pretty and lovable. And of course they are tremendously fond of their children, and their children are tremendously fond of them. But somehow or other many of them aren't like those gentle mothers of yesterday. And it is only once in a while that we meet one of the real old-fashioned kind.

She is not at all interested in what is "being worn," this old-fashioned mother, and she has a serene disregard for "what people say." She seems just to be living her gentle, strong, wholesome life for her family and not to care at all whether clothes and persons and ideas are "fashionable" or not. She never massages her face to keep the wrinkles away or has her hair marceled or chooses corsets that will give her "youthful lines," and yet, if she ever chances to be among any of these ultra-modern women who refuse to be middle-aged, it is the old-fashioned mother who is indeed the most distinguished-looking of them all.

Although she has never won a prize at a bridge tournament or driven a four-in-hand at the horse show or entertained in her box during the opera season, her life has been by no means dull nor uneventful. The children have always required a great deal of care, and there have been some stormy seasons through which she has had to steer the family boat herself. When times were hard and things had gone to pieces in the panic, and her husband's health had given way, she took charge of affairs, as a matter of course. The business fell into her hands for a while, and she set it all on its feet again; a troublesome business it was, too, although she never talked about it nor seemed to regard her management of it as at all extraordinary. It was simply the only thing there was to do. And of course she had to shoulder all her own family cares at the same time, and John never liked to have any one else near him when he was sick.

Her sons and daughters, growing up, have always come to her with their joys and sorrows, their victories and defeats. And though there be those who say that her devotion has made her life a constant sacrifice to her children, those boys and girls are stronger men and women because she has started their lives aright and has given them, almost without their knowing it, the wonderful power of her example to live by. She has never hesitated to do anything, however hard or disagreeable or even menial it may have been, for those whom she loved. She has never been afraid of growing old. She has never clamored for recognition or "credit" or gratitude.

She never talks about herself, the old-fashioned mother. She never insists upon herself. She has the reserve of other days. Her life has been one lone act of giving. And to all those who come near her, her presence brings the cool beauty of an evening's benediction.

TRACKLESS TROLLEY CARS.

Inventor Talks of a Speed of Over a Hundred Miles an Hour.

A balloon trolley line is the last word in aerial navigation and it comes from Marburg, Germany, in a report received at the Department of Commerce and Labor from Thomas H. Norton, United States consul at Chemnitz.

An engineer of Marburg, Consul Norton says, has secured capital to carry out his idea of an aerial trolley line, which is a combination of the essential elements of the dirigible balloon and the electric railroad. The cars are to be supported by the buoyancy of the balloon and the motive power transmitted by an electric cable. The supporting balloon is to be cylindrical in shape, of semi-rigid construction, 200 feet long and 33 feet in diameter. It rests lightly against the cables on either side, channeled wheels attached to the framework of the balloon forming the contact, the cables being suspended at the proper height by towers. The passenger car is to be attached below.

A company has been formed to construct a line on this principle from the railway station at Marburg to Freuenberg, an elevation five miles distant and 1,200 feet above the town. The estimated cost is $28,000 a mile for a double cable line. An important economical feature is the prospect that the cost of maintenance and transportation on the line will be only about 3 per cent of the corresponding expense on an ordinary railroad. It is believed that a speed of 125 miles an hour can be safely made on the balloon trolley.

To the writer of scandals there is a secret satisfaction about being anonymous that is far sweeter than fame.

GOTHAM'S CAR CONDUCTOR.

Has the Passengers of Both Sexes Pretty Well Disciplined.

Manhattan never worries when some horny-handed thug takes a wallop at a street-car conductor, the Cincinnati Times-Star's New York correspondent says. Most of these gentry seem to have been recruited from the Five Points gang and are as free from the deleterious influences of soap and water as an Eskimo in good standing. Look at their hands, and you think they are Zulus. It comes with a shock to one to recognize that they are unquestionably members of the Caucasian tribe. One of the best things they do is to browbeat women and cripples. That's why a story in the morning papers about some servant of the Metropolitan Street Railways Company being beaten into the semblance of a burned custard sends Manhattan downtown on the grin. The other day one of these iron-handed servitors called on a woman for her fare. She tendered him a bill, which he refused. Then, with an apologetic air, for women are rightfully afraid of car conductors here, she offered him five pennies. "I'm sorry," said she, "but they're all I have."

The conductor just turned his hand and dumped the five pennies on the floor. Then he thrust his oxidized mitt out for a nickel. "Gimme your fare—or beat it," was his order.

The woman flushed and trembled. A large male passenger who sat at her right carefully counted five pennies into his own hand. He handed them to the conductor. "Drop them to the floor if you dare," said he.

Now, the nice way to end this story would be to tell of the conductor making a tearful apology and ringing up two fares. Instead of which he promptly dropped the five pennies on the floor where their five predecessors lay. And then he turned a pair of thick brows on Don Quixote. "Fare, please," he chanted, mechanically.

The large male passenger gave him a nickel. The woman got off. The conductor gave the motorman two bells before a little cripple on the rear platform was able to get off, and glared in at the passengers. No one spoke.

Facts For Sick Women

We know of no other medicine which has been so successful in relieving the suffering of women, or secured so many genuine testimonials, as has Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound.

In almost every community you will find women who have been restored to health by Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound. Almost every woman you meet has either been benefited by it, or knows some one who has.

In the Pinkham Laboratory at Lynn, Mass., are files containing over one million one hundred thousand letters from women seeking health, in which many openly state over their own signatures that they have regained their health by taking Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound.

Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound has saved many women from surgical operations.

Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound is made exclusively from roots and herbs, and is perfectly harmless.

The reason why it is so successful is because it contains ingredients which act directly upon the female organism, restoring it to healthy and normal activity.

Thousands of unsolicited and genuine testimonials such as the following prove the efficiency of this simple remedy.

Minneapolis, Minn.:—"I was a great sufferer from female troubles which caused a weakness and broken down condition of the system. I read so much of what Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound had done for other suffering women, I felt sure it would help me, and I must say it did help me wonderfully. Within three months I was a perfectly well woman.

"I want this letter made public to show the benefits to be derived from Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound."—Mrs. John G. Moldan, 2115 Second St. North, Minneapolis, Minn.

Women who are suffering from those distressing ills peculiar to their sex should not lose sight of these facts or doubt the ability of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound to restore their health.

Opening of Cheyenne River Indian Reservation in South Dakota

Registration Dates, Oct. 4 to 23, inclusive.

The General Land Office at Washington has designated Le Beau and Aberdeen, So. Dak., on the Minneapolis & St. Louis R. R. as registration points.

Le Beau, which is the Missouri River terminus of the Minneapolis & St. Louis R. R., is located on the Missouri River, opposite the Reservation, and is the nearest railroad station to three-fifths of the land.

Aberdeen, the other registration point, is the chief city in northern South Dakota.

These points are reached best by the Iowa Central and Minneapolis & St. Louis R. R. lines.

There will be about 14,000 quarter sections allotted to settlers. The land lays well for farming over most of the reservation. The soil is a light loam and is very fertile. It is similar to that in the counties east of the River, where the land sells from $25.00 to $30.00 per acre. Lignite coal is found over a great part of the reservation.

Who May Secure a Homestead—Under the homestead laws of the United States, any person, male or female who is not the owner of more than 160 acres of land in any state or territory, who is a native born citizen of the United States, or has been naturalized, or declared his intention to become a naturalized citizen of the United States (i.e., one who has taken out his first papers of citizenship), who is over the age of 21 years or the head of a family, may make a homestead entry of not exceeding 160 acres of any of the unoccupied lands of the United States.

Only Partly True.

She had been at the seaside and in the country all the summer, and her industrious fiance had been working and waiting for her during the long long days.

Now she had returned, and he had been hearing many things of her and was sore displeased.

"They tell me," he said, painfully "that you flirted desperately with no fewer than six men this summer."

Her cheeks flushed and her eyes blazed.

"Who told you that?" she asked, angrily.

"Several people. It has been common talk."

Her anger gave way to sobs.

"Oh, Frank," she pleaded, as she flung herself on his neck, "it isn't true—it isn't true."

A great load was lifted from his heart.

"No, Frank," she went on, "it isn't true; there were only four."

LURED BY CALL OF THE WILD.

Pittsburg Heiress Plays Role of Real Hobo After Quitting Home.

Alienists who have been called into consultation are unable to explain the wanderlust that has obsessed Miss Mary Patterson, a wealthy young society girl. She was taken into custody at Waukesha, Wis., after a period of wandering since Thanksgiving day.

During her nine months' absence the girl, plentifully supplied with money from her father's estate, scorned the comforts and the luxury of Pullman and dining cars and chose the favored abode of every real hobo—the box car, well filled with damp excelsior, and a bandout whenever it could be procured.

There were no real home troubles to explain her wanderings, the New York World's Pittsburg correspondent says. Mrs. Mary Patterson, the girl's mother, is a woman of wealth and unquestioned society position, as well as being an indulgent parent. The only explanation the alienists have is that the lure of the road called the girl and she answered.

The estate of her father was settled several days before Thanksgiving day. The girl was at her home the morning of that day, but when she was called to dinner there was no response. She had departed for parts unknown.

For months no trace of the girl could be discovered, although detective agencies were employed in the case. Recently, however, Mrs. Patterson received a long-distance call. The voice of her daughter could be plainly distinguished. The girl sent her love to the family, but refused to give them any information as to her whereabouts. Inquiries at the telephone exchange proved that the message came from Chicago.

Then the girl appeared in Waukesha and registered at the Springs City Hotel as M. E. Graham of Clinton, Iowa. The attention of the hotel attaches was attracted to the young woman by her peculiar actions, among them being a propensity for sleeping on the floor of her room and bringing up food from the dining hall to eat cold.

When the police were notified Miss Patterson disappeared. Search by the authorities was instituted, and the girl was found prowling about the Milwaukee yards seeking a convenient box car. She was taken in custody and imprisoned in the home of the sheriff.

Miss Patterson was indignant and demanded her release. Later she attempted to escape. Asked as to her identity and residence, she refused to make any statement, but during the questioning mentioned the name of Dr. Seip of Pittsburg. Through him her mother was notified. Force was necessary to compel her return to Pittsburg.

TREES IN ALL SHAPES.

They May Be Made to Fit Any Space or to Take Any Form.

An expert can make a vine of an apple or a pear tree, a tree of gooseberry or currant bush, or a snake of either, says Country Life in America. He will twist, pinch and fondle the descendant of some mighty apple tree, with its gnarled branches and its forty-foot spread, measuring, planning and nursing until, instead of assuming the shape of its parent, it will grow to fit some space on the side of his house, hugging the wall like a vine, or possibly will form a screen to hide his kitchen porch.

In the rich man's garden abroad we see all sorts of curious forms to which fruit trees have been trained. Some are beautiful, some are freakish, but all are wonderful. In vases, lyres, shields, crests, monograms, soldiers, beautiful maidens the apple or pear tree and the currant bush lose their identity.

Those that are trained like vines certainly possess a distinctive decorative value. In the old days every estate in England worth while had a specimen box tree—a superior example of topiary work—which was pruned to resemble Queen Elizabeth.

In the poor man's garden abroad a trained fruit tree finds its greatest usefulness. No garden is too small for a few trees. The peasant, with a scant six inches or a foot between his walk and his neighbor's fence, still has room to plant a tree and train it against a lattice. While the necessity for maximum returns from minimum acres is not a part of our national point of view, the possibility of the training of trees as a hobby has been very much overlooked.

In Germany you can buy a tree to measure to fill in any space on your garden wall or house, just as we buy a ready-made suit of clothes. While the trining of fruit trees has become popular only within ten years, the Formobstbaumschulen, or schools where trees are trained, are now to be found everywhere in Germany. There are commercial nurseries where experts in espalier work are constantly making new forms and creating new marvels. Certain shapes have become standard, such as pyramids, cordons, palmettos and so on.

There are practically no nurseries in America that have taken up the propagation and sale of trained fruit trees in a serious way, and there is almost no American literature on the subject; consequently one who wishes to take this work as a hobby will be forced to Germany, France or England for his inspiration and for his stock.

RELIGIOUS

God Is Faithful.

HE will silently plan for thee,
Object thou of Omniscient care;
God Himself undertakes to be
Thy Pilit through each subtle snare.

He WILL silently plan for thee,
So certainly, He cannot fail!
Rest on the faithfulness of God,
In Him thou surely shalt prevail.

He will SILENTLY plan for thee,
Some wonderful surprise of love,
Eye hath not seen, nor ear hath heard,
But it is kept for thee above.

He cil silently PLAN for thee,
His purposes shall all unfold,
The tangled skein shall shine at last
A master-piece of skill untold.

He will silently plan for THEE,
Happy child of a Father's care,
As though no other claimed His love,
But thou alone to Him wert dear.
—E. May Grimes.

"The Final Religion."

Christianity is the final religion. This is the answer of the church to all predictions of and questions regarding any alleged "final religion" or "new religion" which is to save the world.

Christ announced himself as the Saviour and his doctrine as the final religion, and the only hope of the world. "I am Alpha and Omega, the beginning and the end, the first and the last." "He that believeth in Me, though he were dead, yet shall he live." He fulfilled all the Messianic prophecies of the Old Testament.

Many pretended Messiahs and religious teachers and reformers have offered cures for the ills of humanity, but they did not meet the prophetic description, nor do the work. These ills are real. Sin is in the world and curses our race, and under every other gospel but the Gospel of Christ has waxed worse and worse. Heathenism is selfish and debasing and cruel. False religions are false lights in a dark world. The answer to Buddhism is India. The answer to Mohammedanism is Turkey. Philosophy is cold and heartless. It offers no hope for the mass of humanity, either for this world or the next.

Our age has its would-be Messiahs. Some of them identify their work with reforms. Some contrast religion with reform. They would turn the thoughts of men away from the forgiveness of sin and the hope of heaven to the betterment of society. Many of these are products of the religion of Christ. They have had Christian training. Their philanthropy and temperance and purity and education are the fruits of the gospel. Heathenism never produced such men. Nor has infidelity produced them; but they would have the fruits, while repudiating the vine which bore them.

All such efforts will fail. Owen Glendower declared that he could "call spirits from the vast deep." The answer was: "Why, so can I, or so can any man, but will they come?" This is the real question. Has any system of philosophy or reform or false religion been able to cast out the demons that infest humanity, the selfishness, lust, wrath, pride, intemperance and covetousness which curse our race? Christianity does it by the power of a new affection, implanted by the divine spirit.

But now come men raised under a Christian civilization and owing all that they have and are to the gospel, who ask: Is Christianity the "final religion?" and talk of a "new religion" with no supernatural element, and no mediator and no mission but to polish society. The thing that hath been, it is the thing that is and shall be. As in the days of Paul, certain men tried to cast out devils, and the devils said: "Jesus I know, and Paul I know, but who are ye?" and he "leaped on them." The spirits of evil in society will rise and prevail against every effort not backed by divine power to cast them out.—Herald and Presbyter.

Followers of Christ.

"Christianity" was not a word used by Paul, and the earliest designation of the disciples of Jesus as Christians was not friendly. But it was true, and the significance of it Paul accepted to the full. Christianity was Christ. It was not a vague and unreflecting admiration. It was a personal and living service of a living, personal Saviour. Paul the Christian was the follower of Christ. But "follower of Christ" was a phrase with meaning and body to it. It meant then and means now, if it meant then and means now anything at all, the union of life, its sin forgiven and its heart purified, with God in Christ, with God in Christ in a sense in which He never was in any other. Are we such Christians? Whether or not we are such consciously as yet, we will become such if we truly follow Paul as Paul followed Christ.

"Called of God."

"Called of God," has a much wider application than to those who are conspicuous for some special work to which they were notably called of God, as was Aaron. It applies to us all. There is a Divine purpose concerning every man. Whether that purpose contemplates some great work which commands the attention of the world, or a life in a narrow sphere and unseen by men, it is a call of God. It is the work to which we are adapted, in the place where we can do it. We find that work, and answer the call by steadily going forward in the path of duty as it comes to us, listening to the voice of God, watching for the indication of His will, as to what is possible for us to do.

A Prayer.

Lord Jesus, we thank Thee for the spirit of self-sacrifice bequeathed by Thee to Thy followers. We thank Thee that self may be denied, put out of remembrance, that Thou mayest come into full control in us. Help us to count life only as means of service, material for use in the upbuilding of Thy kingdom. Grant us the vision of a goal far more desirable and worthy than the keeping of life, even the goal of complete and unreserved spending of ourselves for Thee. Teach us, we pray Thee, the folly of withholding anything from Thee, and the high wisdom of devotion to the uttermost in Thy service. In the Name that is above every name we ask it. Amen.

Stayed Upon God.

"In quietness and in confidence shall be your strength."—Isa. xxx. 15.

The secret of a quiet heart is to keep ever near God. Stayed on Him, we shall not be shaken and our "hearts shall be fixed, trusting in the Lord." We get above the fogs when we soar to God, and circumstances in their wildest whirl will not draw us into the vortex if we are holding by Him and know that He is at our right hand.—Rev. Alexander Maclaren.

HOME-MADE.

John Callahan had decided to make his wife a shirt-waist box. He had read somewhere how easy it was to manufacture shirt-waist boxes, and the idea charmed him. "Now, John," protested Mrs. Callahan, "what's the use? You'll never finish it. You'll spend a lot of money on it, and litter up the whole yard——" "I'm making this," suggested Mr. Callahan, "and it seems to me when I make you a shirt-waist box you might appreciate it instead of acting like that." A writer in the Galveston News tells the story.

There was the hole a foot deep in the yard where Mr. Callahan had started to dig a cellar. There was the pile of rocks with the specially made zinc tank in the middle where he had started to make a "rockery" with an aquarium in it.

There were the four posts starkly upright in the ground where he had started to build a shed and stopped. Across the dividing fence were three rough furrows made by a hoe in the preliminary steps toward making a garden. In the dividing fence was a gap filled with an old shutter and two planks; Mr. Callahan had started to make some pickets to fill the gap, but had put the job aside for another day.

"Don't you worry," he said. "I'll finish this all right." He nailed another block on the bottom of the box to hold one of the rollers, and in trying to bore a hole in it, split it and had to try again. The second attempt split the bottom of the box, but nobody could see it unless the box were turned upside down.

Mrs. Callahan, seeing these things, went in the house. Two hours later she looked out the window. Mr. Callahan was tacking some wire netting across a window in the stable.

"Did you finish it?" she asked, going out. Mr. Callahan looked over his shoulder from where he stood on the wheelbarrow to tack up the netting.

"No, I didn't finish it," he said. "How do you suppose I can finish it without hinges? Somebody's been at my tool-box and taken every hinge I had. I'll have to get some to-morrow."

"Couldn't you get a pair of hinges at the store out here?" ventured Mrs. Callahan. Mr. Callahan scowled.

"Walk all the way over there?" he said. "I should think not. You talk as if I wasn't tired enough to drop. I would have finished it if I'd had those hinges. All it needs is that and the covering."

A week later, in spite of all, the shirt-waist box was done. Mrs. Callahan bought the hinges.

A CITY OF MISFORTUNE.

Rise of Acapulco Stunted by Fair Share of Setbacks.

Little Acapulco, with its 5,000 inhabitants, has received world-wide fame as a city of misfortune.

Twice this year it has been the scene of a catastrophe. On Feb. 15, 300 persons were burned to death when the Flores theater was set on fire by a moving picture machine, and destroyed at a special performance in honor of Governor Flores of the State of Guerrero.

Several times before the city has been damaged by severe earthquakes. In fact, the State of Guerrero is known as the home of seismic disturbances. Its severest shock occurred in 1907.

The whole region suffered, and Chilpancingo, the capital city, was practically destroyed. In 1908, Chilapa, a city of some 15,000 inhabitants, was badly damaged, and on March 27 of the same year, that city was again shaken, completing the ruin of the former shock.

Nevertheless, Acapulco, beset by tropic perils and cursed by a hot, unhealthy climate, is one of the most beautiful spots in the world. Its name, a corruption and abbreviation of Aquae Pulchrae (beautiful waters), rings true. The coast at this point is sheer cliff. Not till the steamer is almost upon it does the bluff-walled, blue channel to Acapulco harbor appear.

At the end of the winding passage is a broad bay, lined with rolling hills, covered with thick forest. The town lies on the north shore, and about the hills are rich plantations.

Cortez himself discovered this bay in 1531, and it was then the history of Acapulco began. From there he sent out the expedition which discovered Sinaloa and there perished. From Acapulco, also, Hernando de Alarcon set sail in 1540 to discover California. And it is a quaint little old place, more Mexican and more artistic than most of the Mexican ports.

Acapulco harbor is one of the finest in the world. It lies 231 miles southwest of Mexico City, of which it was formerly the seaport. It had been for centuries the chief center of commerce with the Philippine Islands, as well as with China and India. By pack trail the merchandise went overland from Acapulco to Mexico City and points beyond. Then came the railroad through from the capital to San Blas, and with it departed the commercial importance of Acapulco.—New York Tribune.

TOTAL LOSS OF HAIR

Seemed Imminent—Scalp Was Very Scaly and Hair Came Out by Handfuls—Scalp Now Clear and New Hair Grown by Cuticura.

"About two years ago I was troubled with my head being scaly. Shortly after that I had an attack of typhoid fever and I was out of the hospital possibly two months when I first noticed the loss of hair, my scalp being still scaly. I started to use dandruff cures to no effect whatever. I had actually lost hope of saving any hair at all. I could brush it off my coat by the handful. I was afraid to comb it. But after using two cakes of Cuticura Soap and nearly a box of Cuticura Ointment, the change was surprising. My scalp is now clear and healthy as could be and my hair thicker than ever, whereas I had my mind made up to be bald. W. F. Steese, 5812 Broad St., Pittsburg, Pa., May 7 and 21, 1908."

Potter Drug & Chem. Corp., Sole Props. of Cuticura Remedies, Boston.

No Honey Factory.

"That was an error," said Senator Beveridge, apropos of an opponent's argument at a dinner in Indianapolis. "Our friend made an embarrassing error. He reminds me of John Winslow. He spent his honeymoon at Niagara. He left the bridal apartment late one night to bathe and on his return knocked, as he supposed, on his wife's door, calling softly:

"'Honey!'

"There was no answer. Winslow knocked again.

"'Honey!'

"Still no answer. Winslow thundered on the door.

"'Honey!' he cried in a voice of agony.

"Then a reply came at last.

"'Sneak, you blooming idiot!' a male voice growled. This is a bedroom, not a blooming beehive.'"

WISHED DEATH MIGHT COME

To Relieve the Awful Suffering of Advanced Kidney Disease.

William Gibson, Greenup, Ky., says: "Three months I was in bed, and would have died, I believe, but for Doan's Kidney Pills. My doctor said the case was hopeless. My back felt as if it were being seared with a red-hot iron. The kidney secretions were painful, irregular and full of sediment. There were puffy spots beneath my eyes and my head pained terribly. I was miserable in every way and often wished death might relieve me. When I began taking Doan's Kidney Pills my condition was so serious that they had little effect, but I persisted, getting gradually better, and it was not a great while before I was cured. The effect has been lasting."

Remember the name—Doan's. Sold by all dealers. 50 cents a box. Foster-Milburn Co., Buffalo, N. Y.

Bottle Suicide.

Drunkenness for deepest troubles is often a preventive or a substitute for suicide, a "temporary suicide" as it were. Many men too cowardly to pull the trigger or take gas, deliberately and viciously commit suicide by the slow alcoholic route, and even say it is an easy way to die. And for this alcohol gets the blame.—Exchange.

In case of pain on the lungs Hamlins Wizard Oil acts like a mustard plaster, except that it is more effective and is so much nicer and cleaner to use.

Confidence of Genius.

"You say your dirigible balloon is a success?"

"Yes," answered the inventor.

"But it came down to the earth with a terrible bump."

"True. But it hit very close to the spot I was aiming at."

Good Housekeepers Use the Best. That's why they use Red Cross Ball Blue. At leading grocers, 5 cents.

All in Good Time.

"I'm sure I don't know why they call this hotel The Palms. Do you? I've never seen a palm anywhere near the place."

"You'll see them before you go. It's a pleasant little surprise the waiters keep for the guests on the last day of their stay."—Puck.

When You Think

Of the pain which many women experience with every month it makes the gentleness and kindness always associated with womanhood seem to be almost a miracle. While in general no woman rebels against what she regards as a natural necessity there is no woman who would not gladly be free from this recurring period of pain.

Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription makes weak women strong and sick women well, and gives them freedom from pain. It establishes regularity, subdues inflammation, heals ulceration and cures female weakness.

Sick women are invited to consult Dr. Pierce by letter, free. All correspondence strictly private and sacredly confidential. Write without fear and without fee to World's Dispensary Medical Association, R. V. Pierce, M. D., President, Buffalo, N. Y.

If you want a book that tells all about woman's diseases, and how to cure them at home, send 21 one-cent stamps to Dr. Pierce to pay cost of mailing only, and he will send you a free copy of his great thousand-page illustrated Common Sense Medical Adviser—revised, up-to-date edition, in paper covers. In handsome cloth-binding, 31 stamps.

This coat gives a good idea of the season's tendency toward the Moyen Age style—low waist line and pleated skirt. A dark blue diagonal cloth is used here, matching the one-piece dress worn with it.

Persistence of the Habit.

Jack Spratt and his wife were persons of more than ordinarily limited means.

Occasionally they spent 15 cents for one of the illustrated monthly magazines.

Jack loathed the advertisements and his wife detested the reading matter.

So they split it in two, and thus kept clean their literary platter.

The U. S. Government has bought 25 Gross (3,600 boxes) of Rough on Rats to send to the Panama Canal Zone, because it does the work. The old reliable, that never fails. The unbeatable exterminator. 15c, 25c, 75c.

This $1000.00 Cup for an ear of Corn

Made by Tiffany. Nearly 3 ft. high—in solid gold and silver. Actual contract price $1,000. To be awarded at the

to the man, woman or child producing the best ear of corn grown this year in the United States.

Open to everybody belonging to the Association—Nothing to buy or sell.

The purpose of the donor of this trophy—W. K. Kellogg—is to improve the quality of the millions of bushels of corn used in making Kellogg's Toasted Corn Flakes.

Many people think the perfection of corn flavor has been reached in Toasted Corn Flakes. Perhaps it has. If you don't know how good Kellogg's — the genuine Toasted Corn Flakes—is, try it. Then you'll see how hard a task we are giving ourselves to improve it, and the only way we can improve it is by the betterment of the corn itself.

Professor Holden, of the Iowa State College, the greatest authority on corn in the world, will award the prize at the National Corn Exposition, to be held at Omaha, Neb., Dec. 6th to 18th, 1909. Two simple rules will govern the plan, and they are—that you send your best ear of corn to the National Corn Exposition, Omaha, Neb., before November 27, 1909, and that you are a member of the National Corn Association—full particulars regarding which can be had by writing to National Corn Exposition, Omaha, Neb. Tie a tag securely to your specimen and word it, "For the Kellogg Trophy Contest," and write your name and address plainly. If yours is judged the best, you will get the trophy for 1910. If you succeed again next year or the year following, the trophy will become your property for all time.

The contest will be open to every state in the Union. Professor Holden will judge the corn particularly on the basis of quality. The growing of more corn per acre is one object of the award, but the main purpose of the founder of the trophy is for improving the quality of corn used in making KELLOGG'S TOASTED CORN FLAKES. If you haven't tried this delicious cereal, begin your education in "good things to eat" today. All grocers have it.

Frank Abram, proprietor of the Star theatre, is suffering with the rheumatism.

John Swinehart is moving his family on the Brown farm east of Butler this week.

Sam Firestone and wife of Colby, Kansas, came Tuesday for a visit with S. K. Firestone and other relatives in Butler.

The HERALD wishes to congratulate the Garrett Press upon the conservative way in which it chronicled the shooting affair in Butler. Thank you, Bro. Kist.

Chas. Fanning, engineer at the pump station carries his hand, minus part of one finger, in a sling. Got caught in one of the big pumps a few nights ago.—Stryker Advance.

After a few weeks suspension the Ashley Times shows up again, H. W. Morley of the Angola Herald appearing as proprietor, and John Morrison as manager. Here's hopin' for her future prosperity.

Many school children suffer from constipation, which is often the cause of seeming stupidity at lessons. Chamberlain's Stomach and Liver Tablets are an ideal medicine to give a child, for they are mild and gentle in their effect, and will cure even chronic constipation. Sold by Geo. W. Geddes. 44-1m

The following ladies, by invitation went from here Tuesday to meet with the Butler lodge Order Eastern Star; Mrs. H. Sanders, Mrs. Clyde Watson. At Waterloo they were met by Mrs. Earl Leas and Mrs. Dan Leas, who are also members of the lodge in this city, and were royally entertained by the lodge and report having had a delightful time. The Angola ladies returned today.—Angola Herald.

When a cold becomes settled in the system, it will take several days' treatment to cure it, and the best remedy to use is Chamberlain's Cough Remedy. It will cure quicker than any other, and also leaves the system in a natural and healthy condition. Sold by Geo. W. Geddes. 44-1m

Andy Duncan, one of the oldest citizens of Waterloo, who has been making his home at the Central hotel in that city, was found in an unconscious condition in his room Saturday morning. He did not get up at the usual time and an effort to arouse him was made by hammering on the door, but no response. Finally the door was broken in and the aged man was suffering from an attack of enlargement of the heart and in only a few more hours would have passed away. Dr. E. K. Shurtz was summoned and with the assistance of stimulants he was revived. Mr. Duncan is past seventy-five years of age.

The old, old story, told times without number, and repeated over and over again for the last 36 years, but it is always a welcome story to those in search of health—There is nothing in the world that cures coughs and colds as quickly as Chamberlain's Cough Remedy. Sold by Geo. W. Geddes. 44-1m

Waldo W. Miller and Miss Ethel Mayme Teeter, of Ligonier, were united in marriage, Thursday evening, Oct. 21, at six o'clock. The ceremony was performed by Elder Stauffer, of Angola. The wedding occurred in the home recently furnished in the E. L. Oster property over in "Canada." Only the immediate relatives of the bride and groom were present to witness the ceremony. After the marriage vows had been taken supper was served.

The bride is the daughter of Mrs. Emma Teeter and highly respected in her home town, Ligonier. She should be received with Hamilton's best society.

The groom is the son of Mr. and Mrs. Thos. Miller, of Angola, and is in the drug business in Hamilton. He is straight, upright young man and has made a host of friends since coming here.—Hamilton News.

The Twilight of Life

The muscles of the stomach in old age are not as strong or active as in youth and in consequence old people are very subject to constipation and indigestion. Many seldom have a bowel movement without artificial aid. Many, also, have unpleasant eructations of gas from the stomach after eating. All this can be avoided by the use of Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin, which permanently regulates the bowels so that passages come naturally, and so strengthens the stomach that food is digested without discomfort. It is absolutely guaranteed to do what is claimed, and if you want to try it before buying, send your address for a free sample bottle to Pepsin Syrup Co., 119 Caldwell Bldg., Monticello, Ill. It is sold by all druggists at 50c and $1 a bottle. 44-1m

FALL OPENING '09

This Grand Autumn Event

BEGINS SATURDAY MORNING, NOVEMBER 6, AND ENDS SATURDAY NIGHT, NOVEMBER 13.

A Surprising Exhibit of New Styles Combined With Absolutely Unequalled Values.

Now, that our store is remodeled and our steam heating plant is installed, we inaugurate the season by affording you the opportunity to view the new things Fashion has created and of buying at unusually favorable prices.

Our buyer has just returned from the eastern markets, where we bought for spot cash, over Ten Thousand Dollars worth of merchandise, needless to say we procured some wonderful price concessions.

We buy all our goods direct, pay cash and obtain close figures. We sell at a modest percentage of profit, no larger at the start of the season than when it is several months old. Thus new goods cost less here than elsewhere at this time.

We have made rapid strides since we acquired this store last May and this event will emphasize the fact that we sell high-grade dependable merchandise at its lowest cost.

Visit the store now and all style questions can be settled to your satisfaction. Every department is filled with the new and beautiful fall and winter goods. All fashion decrees as correct is here. Come and view it. Revel in a style showing unequaled in this vicinity.

Then if you desire to possess what you admire you'll find that it is not necessary to wait until the price is lowered, as is the usual custom in many stores. Here you can buy at as little cost as you'll be charged later elsewhere and in the intervening time you'll enjoy the satisfaction of wearing and having strictly new things. The style importance of this event is not overshadowed by the value giving. Each feature is alike unequalled.

Store Talk
For Your Sake
As well as ours we ask you to keep posted on the offerings of this store. The Dress Goods, Silks, Ladies' Suits, Coats, Furs, Shoes, Clothing and all other departments are very inviting in their display of all that is new and stylish in merchandise for winter. Qualities that are right, styles that are the latest, prices that will please.
Hosiery and Underwear
In all earnestness we say to you that now is a good time to lay in a supply of hosiery and underwear and underwear for your entire family. Such qualities and values as we offer now will not possible another season.
It has always been our aim to have this department a trade winner. Merchandise that fits, wears and is reasonable in price is the great difficulty in this class of goods.
Whether it's hosiery or underwear, you are uncomfortable if you are not perfectly fitted; and you are dissatisfied unless you get good value for your money.
We have studied both these problems in connection with this department and we feel that we have the best fitting and the best wearing lines to be had in the country. Whether it is for yourself or your children we know we can please you.
Notions and Novelties
Whether it's a smallest item to be found in a Dry Goods Store, say a paper of pins, or the most elegant or elaborate novelty in the nature of a belt, bags, veil or some jewelry ornament, we want you to feel that you will find it right here. We have always paid much attention to our notion section, feeling that it is as much our duty to render good service and please you in the sale of these small items as it is when the article you want may run well up into the dollars. Give us an opportunity to prove this—

To discover the North Pole is not all that an explorer must do. He has got to prove it to a lot of suspicious rivals.

Uncle Sam will not begin taking the next census till April 15, 1910; don't begin to worry yet about being overlooked.

Ill fares the land to hastening ills a prey, where farmers think wheat raising doesn't pay.—Goldsmith, revised by Hill.

The African Diamond Trust has put up prices. Here is where the heartless monopolies take advantage again of the necessity of the poor.

Some men are born tired, some are tired because they have to work, and some are trying to read the entire output of North Polar literature.

Dr. Cook expects to make $500,000 lecturing on his dash to the pole. Peary probably expects to make twice that sum telling how Cook didn't dash.

The quickest way to start a calamity howl or to hear all about hard times is to sit down among a bunch of chronic loafers and make a remark about prosperity.

What do you think of this?. Mr. Stickney states that the rebate evil, instead of being stamped out by the enforcement of the new law, flourishes now more than ever.

Dr. Murphy has discovered a way to make new joints. Perhaps this method will fix us up so we may scratch between our shoulder-blades without rubbing against a post.

The wife of a rich Pennsylvanian has, after an unexplained absence of six months, returned home and been forgiven by her husband. She may know something concerning his past which he doesn't want the public to find out.

For the first time the chancellor of the German Empire is a commoner. It is "Herr Doctor" von Bethmann-Hollweg, and not "count" nor "prince" nor even "baron." Eventually, no doubt, the German chancellor will become, like the premiers of England, or France, or Italy, the chief of a parliamentary majority, and not the personal representative of the Emperor himself.

"Gumdrops and science!" What a combination is here! Mr. Bradley says of all the sweetest things on earth the Eskimos' sweet tooth is the sweetest, and he adds that the envious denizen of the North will travel thirty miles for one sweet gumdrop. Who knows but that these gumdrops were a great factor in the exploration of the unknown world. Who will doubt that they were not, after all, the lowly agents that brought about the much-sought-for end?

One of the most perplexing features of the immigration problem is the tendency of the newly arrived aliens to settle down in the overcrowded tenement districts of the great coast cities. Comparatively few have the means or disposition to penetrate into the interior of the country, where workmen are more needed, and independence is more quickly and surely gained. Two years ago Congress authorized the Commissioner of Immigration to establish a division of information, which should give to immigrants the kind of advice that would help them to decide where to settle, and distribute those in search of work to quarters where their labor was needed. During the first year more than two thousand persons were thus directed to available homes or suitable places of employment, in thirty-five different States. Thirty-eight occupations and thirty-four nationalities were represented. Last summer more than three thousand were sent to the harvest-fields of the West. In comparison with the total immigration, these numbers seem small. But they represent a substantial amount of usefulness for the new institution. As the division of information becomes more and more familiar with its work, and employes in different parts of the country come to realize its existence, its opportunities for helpful service are certain to increase.

An anxious inquirer wants to know what has become of the man that used to carry a cabbage leaf in the crown of his hat to ward off sunstroke. We remember him well. He wore other things besides the cabbage leaf and a hat; items, bluejeans trousers, a brown jeans coat, a cotton shirt, woolen socks, and cowhide boots, the last framed coming in a wooden box, big at one end and little at the other, beginning with No. twelves—men's size—and tapering down to the copper toes for the small fry. In the wintertime he greased the boots with mutton tallow to render them soft and pliable, but even then it required the combined efforts of a bootjack and the entire family to begin his undressing.

He built his barn on the crest of the hill and his house in the valley below, so as to be near the spring. Tradition and the almanac governed his farming methods. He planted his potatoes in the dark of the moon and his beans in the light of the moon, and split his cow's tail to cure her of the "holler horn." He rose at 4 in the morning, fed the stock by lantern light, and sat on the fence waiting for dawn to enable him to work in the field. His wants were simple. The farm products supplied the table with almost everything except sugar and coffee. These he traded for at the "store," giving in exchange spring chickens at 5 to 10 cents apiece and eggs at 10 to 15 cents a dozen. At hog-killing time he had fresh meat as long as the sausage and spareribs lasted. After that he went from bacon to ham, and then from ham to bacon, with a kit of salt mackerel added about twice a year. His social diversions were few. In summer he was too busy, and in winter the roads were too bad for much travel. In spite of that he got to the county seat occasionally and served on the jury two or three times. Once he went to the "city," as the nearest metropolis was vaguely designated. After that event he was wont to shake his head at unexpected moments and mutter, "Such a rippin' and a rarin'!" Readers of a certain class of magazines imagine that his favorite oath was "By heck," but this is a mistake. "I granny" and "plague take it" were his strongest expletives as a rule, the former indicative of a modified form of ancestry worship, while the latter bears evidence of a transmitted English oath, it in turn harking back to the days of London's pestilence. All in all, his was a drab-colored existence, broken but not brightened by hog cholera, quarterly interests, and annual taxes. Like as not, the whole thing ended by his getting caught in a cold rainstorm; then came a sudden chill and pneumonia, or, as they called it then, "the lung fever." He left the farm and the mortgage to his eldest son and told everybody he was "willin' to go," and no one seemed to doubt it. So that's what has become of him. Another reigns in his stead, but everything has changed. Other times, other manners. His successor has a house on the hill, with hot-water heat and electric lights and a bath tub. The mortgage has been replaced by a bank account. Macadam roads, tailor-cut clothes, an automobile, scientific farming, rural free delivery, cows milked with a suction pump, eggs 30 cents a dozen, butter 40 cents a pound—cash. Where is the man with the cabbage leaf? Non est, we tell you. He is as extinct as the dodo.

ZEPPELIN'S LIFE STORY.

For Many Years Regarded as a Madman Before Reaching Success.

Of all the men now engaged in the study of aviation none has had a more interesting career than Count Zeppelin, whose recent flight of nearly a thousand miles broke all previous records. Until success came, his hardships were almost unbelievable, and he spent the whole of his fortune in carrying out his experiments. His first interest in aerial flight probably dates from the American Civil War, when he made an ascent in a captive balloon to watch the operations, says the Boston Transcript. After this, he returned to Germany in time for the Franco-German war, and is said to have been the first German soldier who crossed the frontier into France. When peace was restored, he determined to give his whole life to aeronautics, and in a comparatively short time he had spent £30,000 in what appeared to be almost fruitless effort. At one time he was so poor through his devotion to his work that he had to live in a little cottage on an allowance made to him by his friends. But his invincible pluck brought success at last, and one of the first to recognize his genius was the kaiser himself.

Although he is considerably over 70, Count Zeppelin is still as active as most men only half his age. A German newspaper has described him as follows: "He stands tall and upright; he has an agile body capable of unusual exertion, a constitution sturdy through much exercise and simple habits, and an immense power of mental concentration. He is always amiable, modest and deliberate. His workmen are devoted to him heart and soul." Through all his many failures, and during the dark time when his nearest friends looked upon him as next door to a madman, the count has had the continual help and counsel of his wife, and even when her husband's experiments brought her to the verge of poverty she still had perfect faith in him and never murmured. It must have been a proud day for the countess when the king and queen of Wurtemberg took a trip in the count's airship, and a prouder day still when the kaiser called her husband "the greatest German of the twentieth century."

On more than one occasion Count Zeppenlin has come very near to losing his life. Once, for instance, he fell from a height of forty feet, but escaped serious injury through landing upon some bushes. Another time he fell a considerable distance upon some soft earth. Of course, he has had many more or less serious disasters to his airships, and only last year he had a particularly narrow escape. Shortly after landing at Echterdingen there were such large crowds to welcome him that, to avoid an ovation, he retired to a cabin on the airship and fell asleep. By some lucky chance he did not sleep for long, for only a few minutes after he awoke the airship was in flames, and had he remained asleep his fate would have been almost certain. It is said, by the way, that Count Zeppelin was once in such despair of ever achieving his ends that he seriously thought of blowing his brains out.

Comgh Shells.

A conch shell with its spirals twisted to the right instead of to the left is said to be worth its weight in gold. A shell of this kind sold in Calcutta for £4,000.

Potato Crop.

The potato crop of the world is roughly 5,000,000,000 bushels a year. Most of it is raised in Europe.

PAPERS BY THE PEOPLE

WE ARE MEN ONLY AS WE BECOME MEN.

By Prof. George B. Foster.

Almost every language contains the equivalent of our old saying: "He's a chip of the old block." And then there is O. W. Holmes' bon mot: "Every man is an omnibus in which all his ancestors are riding."

More important still, the old church and the new science both know a law of hereditation. Man is hereditarily burdened with predisposition to disease and vice, they both assert. Now, the old church had a plan of escape from this network of necessity. A divine decree of grace arranged for the salvation of a part of the race from the ruin of hereditary sin. But this sort of salvation does not satisfy the moral sense of the modern man. That a fixed number were arbitrarily selected to be saved from the curse under which our common humanity groaned—this conception has turned out to be offensiva to the moral sense. No man wants that blessedness in which he must helplessly gaze upon the damnation of his brothers who were passed by in the decree of grace.

It is not whether we have inherited bane or blessing, it is what we do with our heritage that counts in the world of values. And we can convert our curse into a blessing, our blessing into a curse, both into character. The law of heredity which at the beginning of my career binds me to its network can in the end free me from its network. I may be saved by the law from the law. Instead of thus denying the law we fulfill it.

AMERICA NO LONGER MERE SPECTATOR.

By Sidney Brooks.

It is difficult for Europeans, who live in a powder magazine and rarely have the fear of an explosion out of their minds, to realize the simplicity, spaciousness, and unhampered self-absorption of American life. Foreign politics is minimized by them at least as much as it is exaggerated by Europeans. Americans can hardly be got to take them seriously. A diplomatic dispute with another power, conducted on either side upon the implication of force, is of all experiences the one most foreign to their normal routine of existence. When you have mentioned the Monroe doctrine you have pretty well indicated the sum of the average citizen's interest in external affairs.

During several years in the United States I do not recall a single well informed debate in Congress on the foreign policy of the republic or a single member who ever treated his constituents to an address on such a topic. The operative opinion of the commonwealth still desires to have as few dealings as possible with foreign powers, still quotes and abides by Washington's warning against "entangling alliances," still shrinks from any course that threatens "complications," still clings to the policy of isolation as the one that most adequately squares with the needs of American conditions.

This is so even though facts and necessity have outrun many of the formulas, prejudices, and traditions that a decade and a half ago were all but omnipotent. The peculiarity of America's position in the general scheme of world politics is indeed precisely this, that her people are unconsciously engaged in adapting their mental outlook to their achievements. The Spanish war landed them on a stream of tendencies that has already carried them far beyond their old confines, and is inexorably destined to carry them farther still.

UNITED STATES, PRECEPTOR OF JAPAN.

By Louis Ichige Ogata.

A visitor to Japan is at once impressed with the evident desire for education among the Japanese people that shows itself on every hand. The governmental regulation that makes education compulsory is really little needed, for the parents themselves show the greatest eagerness to give their children the best school advantages they can afford. In spite of the multitude of children who swarm the streets and the vast number who work in the fields and in various industries where the cheap labor of children can be used to advantage, school statistics in Japan show a much better percentage of children of school age in attendance than is shown in some States in America.

Recent reports show that there are about 30,000 public and private schools, nearly 120,000 professors and teachers, and about 5,295,000 students in Japan. There is hardly an incorporated city in the empire that has not at least one kindergarten. Many colleges and universities, public and private, furnish opportunity for higher learning to thousands of Japanese young men as well as women, but the crown of them all is the imperial university.

MARRIAGE AND GOOD LOOKS.

By Betty Vincent.

Girls, do you marry a man because he dresses well or because you love him? Do you love him because he is 6 feet tall and broad-shouldered or because he is honorable and a gentleman? From some of the letters I receive from young girls I cannot help inferring that their ideal is a combination of a clothing house poster and a showman in a musical production.

If the heart of the man is tender and kind, what can it matter if every feature on his face is hopelessly crooked? The doll-faced man is as bad as, and worse than, the doll-faced girl. The rugged man of sterling worth is the man to guard a woman's future and happiness. If you are impressed with a man's smartness of dress stop and think, girls, how that same man would look in rough and simple working clothes. Ask yourself, too, if you would be willing to give up many of your own little vanities that your husband might gratify his own fastidious sense of adornment.

On the Orient Express an enigmatic gentleman with a mauve ribbon in his buttonhole hastens to Paris, writes a correspondent from the French capital. The Cologne Express carries another, the Sud Express a third. A fourth comes by the English packet. From Lisbon and St. Petersburg two start; from Rome and Constantinople two arrive. All wear the pale mauve ribbon.

They are the cooks of four great kings.

Without the best butters, vinegars, wines, truffles, mushrooms, herbs, cream, spices and raw materials of all kinds, there is no grand cookery. The pantry chef hands out the ingredients of every dish completely garnished to his colleagues. He has one specialty. All cold dishes are his particular care.

The kitchens of Edward, the Czar, Alfonso and Leopold are to-day near perfection. Francis Joseph up to ten years ago kept the most princely table of them all. When age forced him to go slow he still invited the archdukes and their suites. Then finally the force was handed over to the Archduke Ferdinand, whose simple living is natural and whose enthusiasm did not last a year. For the first time in 1,000 years the court of the Holy Roman Empire (till 1809) had no longer the greatest kitchen of the world.

To-day Francis Joseph eats alone. When he goes on a gastronomic spree it is with frankfurters and horseradish, with "spaetzle" cakes. But the kitchens of Nicholas, Edward, Alfonso and Leopold are run on the great old lines of:

1. A pantry chef.
2. A chef of soups, entrees and hot desserts, including souffles, fritters (sweet or otherwise), hot fruit croutes, etc.
3. A chef roaster, who also directs all grills and fries.
4. A sauce chef, who rules over all that carries a sauce; fish, braised meats, etc., i. e., the majority of dishes.
5. A pastry cook.
6. A chef decorator. Do not think he decorates the table. He decorates the food. Be it the czar's bear chops, the baby bear with bright glass eyes is brought in holding his own chops on a silver plate garnished with smilax. When Edward eats his favorite turtle doves they come boned, wrapped in a chaud-froid sauce with cameo design in black truffles. They are ranged round a bed of Spanish chestnuts puree. But, above them, the beautiful birds spread their white wings.

Such "presentations" of the dish are the chef decorator's work. He—almost a taxidermist—spreads the tail of the peacock in his gorgeous feathers over the roast peacock, whose breast meat only is eaten. Never will the sauce cook try to roast nor the roaster touch a sauce. Those turtle doves pass from chef to chef, each adding what the lilac ribbon orders.

Quellian, head chef of the old sultan, taken over by the new, quit the Cafe de Paris six years ago on $2,000 per year salary and an admitted commission on purchases of from $6,000 to $8,000. To-day he has a real dilettante to work for—the new sultan is a poet, rose grower and gourmet; but M. Quellian deplores the Turkish craze for stuffed meats of all kinds. They actually want the Rouen duck complicated with a stuffing—that terrible strangled "high" duck, whose sauce demands its liver festered in the sun!

M. Menager, head chef of Edward, and M. Peltier, head chef of Queen Alexandra, have fixed salaries of $8,000, free lodgings and a rake-off of 3 per cent on all purchases accepted by them. Queen Alexandra has simple tastes—a breast of Bohemian pheasant, a slice of Danube sturgeon, or a saddle of Siberian young boar. On the contrary, King Edward probably knows more about great feeding than did Carlos himself. He delights in plovers' eggs. He adores little birds.

The art of these cooks is sublime. Each can give you a choice of 5,000 dishes. There are 125 ways of preparing eggs, 32 "on the plate" (not fried, but done in the bainmarie) 47 poached, 20 with cheese, 12 "en cocotte" (tiny earthen dish), 32 omelettes, not to mention any use of hard boiled eggs. Veal is cooked in 90 ways. There are 80 principal soups.

The nursing school of modern gastronomy is the Salon of Parisian Crefs. Here meet Paul de Amici of the Quirinal kitchens, Bosomporo of the Vatican, Quenon of Belgium; Borelli, with Prince Doria, and others.

A great catering combination it is, able to undertake the most brilliant gala dinners at a day's notice. Its center is Paris. It is run by business men who can offer many advantages that an artist chef, thoughtless of money details, might not think of. It is the beginning of the end of princely kitchens.

The Harmless Foe.

"Your political antagonist is calling you every name he can think of," said the agitated friend.

"Don't interrupt him," said Senator Sorghum. "It is better to have a man searching the dictionary for epithets than going after your record for facts."—Washington Star.

It may not be possible for you to be agreeable to some people, but you can keep away from them.

SAW GERMAN FARMERS WORK.

Congressman Says Harvesters There Never Get in a Hurry.

Congressman and Mrs. Hitchcock, accompanied by Miss Ruth Hitchcock and Miss Crounse, returned recently from a short trip to Europe, the Omaha World-Herald says.

Referring to the trip, Mr. Hitchcock said: "We were in Germany during the early harvest season and the work of whole families in the fields presented scenes of prosperity and contentment. The work would be hard if done in a hurry and rush, as we Americans do it, but it does not appear to be so in German harvest fields. Old, young and middle-aged of both sexes work away rather leisurely. They stop to rest and talk or take refreshments often, and as a rule appear to be having a good time. I understand that Germany has 18,000,000 people 'upon the land,' as the expression goes. That is a large proportion of her 65,000,000 people.

"The best part of Germany' factory life is that competition still remains. It has not been wiped out by the trusts, as in America. The factories are scattered all over the German empire. Every town of any size has its smoking factory chimneys. In fifteen years the wealth of Germany has increased 59 per cent. The only unfavorable symptom is the increase in living expenses. The increase is much greater in Germany than in England or France, but is less than in the United States.

"I visited the city of Rheims in France during the great international flying machine contests and saw three flying machines in the air at the same time traveling at railroad train speed under perfect control. I saw both the monoplane and the biplane in flight and had a chance to see the advantages of each type. The double plane has the greatest carrying capacity, but the single plane looks more like a bird, is simpler and more graceful.

"We timed our visit to Munich so as to attend the great Wagner festival, which is one of the musical treats that Europe offers each year. It is a strange sight to see people wearing their evening full-dress clothes at 3:30 in the afternoon and start for the opera. That custom, however, has its advantages. You get home by 10 o'clock without feeling the least bit tired, because you have two long intermissions which afford plenty of time for refreshments and a walk in the beautiful theater garden. We attended the four operas of the Niebelungen ring and were delighted with the splendid productions."

Busy Mr. Harries.

Gen. George H. Harries, commander-in-chief of the militia of the District of Columbia, is the busiest centurion in the land. In addition to being a soldier, he runs an electric light company and manages a traction company that is the wonder of those who know what good car service means. In addition he is a member of all committees of civic organizations.

"I met Mrs. Harries just a few minutes ago," said one of the general's friends by way of making talk when they met.

"Fine. I'm very glad to hear it," returned the general. "I met her myself last week."

NEW KIND OF SWINDLE.

Paris Gang Organized Automobile Accidents for Eight Years.

Two splendid automobiles, some porcelain vases and a forged title of nobility were the stock in trade of a cleverly organized band of swindlers, who for the last eight years seem to have made an excellent living out of it, says a Paris correspondent of the London Telegraph. Their method was very simple. The gang consisted of six associates, the eldest of whom assumed the title of count. A boulevard beauty completed the membership. She passed off as a theatrical artiste who owned one of the autos. The pseudo-count obtained various appointments as an accident insurance agent and had his automobiles regularly insured in different companies against accident. The other members of the gang acted either a chauffeurs or owners of the cars, with new names and addresses on each occasion. The porcelain vases, worth only very little, were certified to have been purchased for 5,000 france.

When money was needed at the end of each month the two automobiles were simply brought into collision in any public thoroughfare, and the one occupied by the artiste invariably contained one of the porcelain vases, which was smashed in the shock. Policemen only too willingly took note of the damage done, and the companies usually paid out the sum of $1,000 claimed. To avoid suspicion being excited by the too frequent demolition of porcelain vases, other objects of art were sometimes carried in the cars, with a similarly high, but fictitious, purchase price. A mere accident revealed the whole secret of the gang. The pseudo-count happened to have a quarrel with a tram-conductor over a trifle, and both were taken to the police station. The insolent behavior of the sham count when parading his title and showing his card aroused the suspicion of the police officer, who then and there ordered him to be searched, and found him in possession of accident insurance policies with nearly every company operating in Paris.

Why one person should have such contracts with a hundred different companies seemed strange and the pseudo-count could give no plausible explanation, with the result that he was kept in custody and further inquiries caused the arrest of the entire gang, including the boulevard beauty, whose apartments were stocked with cheap works of art, for which she held certificates of purchase representing them as worth from £500 to £600. The two automobiles have also been confiscated and the amount of the sums which the gang is known to have obtained from different accident insurance companies is $40,000.

Science AND Invention

A Pennsylvanian has patented a waterproof cover for women's hats, so compact that it may be folded and carried in the pocket.

A vein of lead and zinc ore has been discovered on the ground of the School of Mines at Platteville, Wis., and will be developed by the students.

The danger in packing meat extracts and preparation in tin is said to lie in the fact that the absorption of the tin by the contents is continuous.

Artificial slates are made by coating paper with a mixture of copal varnish, turpentine, blotting sand, powdered glass, powdered slate and lamp black.

New York has nearly 5,000,000 acres of meadow land, upon which more than 6,000,000 tons of hay are raised each year. Concrete safes, molded in a single piece, with steel doors, are a novelty. They are said to be both damp and fireproof.

The Atchison Railroad is about to experiment at Great Bend, Kan., with cocobolo and Japanese oak as material for sleepers. The wood is so hard that it is almost impossible to drive spikes into it, and screw spikes in bored holes will be used. It is expected that the sleepers will last from 25 to 30 years. They cost a trifle more than American oak delivered in California. The reason for experimenting with them is that native oak is becoming scarce, and it is deemed wise to look in time for a substitute.

Mr. Robert W. Yerkes raises the question whether kittens are born with a propensity to eat mice. Three Manx kittens kept in a cage for six weeks with a mouse, which was introduced when they were five months old, made no attempt to injure it, although they were hungry, until the mother cat was introduced and showed how mice should be treated. Other observers have noted the indisposition of kittens to attack mice, but the question whether mouse-killing is instinctive or educational with them can hardly be said to have been settled.

San Benito County, California, has given its name to a new candidate for admission to the circle of the precious stones—"benitoite." It is a sapphire color, hard and remarkably brilliant. Chemists say it is a "silico-titanate of baryum." It is found in rock pockets and in geodes associated with natrolite and a hitherto unknown black mineral called carlosite. During 1907 benitoite made its first entry into the report of the Geological Survey on the precious stones of the United States. The value of the uncut stones found in that year was $1,500. In the same year Arkansas produced $2,800 worth of diamonds. The leading precious stone in America in value of production is tourmalin, of which $84,120 worth was put upon the market in 1907. But it weighed a ton.

Philippine Forests.

The forests of the Philippine Islands cover an area of about 40,000,000 acres. The island of Mindanao, with an area of some 20,000,000 acres, has immense tracts of almost unbroken forests.

Preserved Plums.

Wipe carefully ripe but firm plums, using a damp cloth for this purpose. Pierce each plum with a fork to prevent bursting. Weigh the fruit, and for each pound of it allow a pound of sugar and a pint of water. Cook the sugar and water together to a clear sirup, then lay in the fruit and simmer for 20 minutes. Lift the plums out with a perforated spoon, pack in heated jars, boil the sirup until thick, fill the jars to overflowing with it, and seal.

Bread Pudding.

Soak a pint of fine crumbs in a quart of milk for two hours. Whip into the soft crumbs two tablespoonfuls of melted butter, a half teaspoonful of powdered nutmeg and the beaten yolks of four eggs. Flavor with vanilla and, last of all, fold in quickly the stiffened whites of the four eggs. Bake in a greased pudding dish in a steady oven. Eat hot with a hard sauce.

Jelly in Earthen Molds.

Rinse the mold in cold water, pour out the water and turn in the jelly. To unmold set the mold in rather warm water, warmer than in case of tin or metal, that comes up on the outside to the height of the jelly within. Turn the mold from side to side, to see that the jelly starts from the surface on all sides, then invert the mold on the dish.

Flannel Cakes.

One pint of sour milk, three teaspoonfuls of melted lard, three eggs well beaten, one teaspoonful of soda, and flour to make a good batter. Mix well, beating the whites and yolks of the eggs separately, and adding the stiffened whites last of all. Fold in lightly and quickly, then bake the batter on a griddle as you would other pancakes.

Vegetable Chop Suey.

Put one cupful of onions fried until brown, one cupful of celery cut in two-inch pieces and then shredded and stewed in vegetable stock for half an hour; one cupful of fried mushrooms and two cupfuls of boiled rice in a saucepan with a cupful of thin brown sauce. Let all heat together for ten minutes and season with salt and pepper.

Onions in Cream.

Use boiled seasoned onions, tender but not broken. Drain well, pour over each pint of small onions one cupful of cream, let cream scald, season with salt and pepper and serve hot. May be sprinkled with a little minced parsley.

Boiled onions may be served with any hot sauce—tomato, brown, mushroom, etc.

Butter Scotch.

Into a pound of brown sugar stir a cup of water and two tablespoonfuls of vinegar. Cook steadily for ten minutes, then stir in four tablespoonfuls of butter and cook until a little dropped into cold water hardens at once. Pour into buttered tins and as it cools mark off into squares.

Nut Bread.

Two cups of milk, one-half cup of sugar, four cups of flour, one cup of broken nut meats, four teaspoonfuls of baking powder, one teaspoonful of salt, two beaten eggs. Put into greased pans and set aside for twenty minutes, then bake for thirty minutes in a moderate oven.

Spanish Stew.

Two pounds of beef ribs, one pint of canned tomatoes, one large onion, one red pepper, six cloves. Cover with a quart of water and simmer very slowly for two or three hours. Salt to taste and thicken the gravy with browned flour just before serving.

Short Suggestions.

Clean linoleum with warm water and polish with milk.

Ammonia used unsparingly cleanses and purifies kitchen utensils.

Clean soiled wall paper with plaster of paris tied up in a muslin bag.

No soap on window panes! Rub them with either alcohol or ammonia to make them shine.

Apply the white of an egg with a camel's hair brush to fly specks on gilt frames and they will disappear.

Soft soap made from half a pound of shaved down hard soap and two quarts of water will save the soap bill at cleaning time.

All the cooking utensils should be washed with soda immediately after they have been used, which will remove every trace of grease.

Grated raw potato makes a splendid cleanser for carpets. Rub it over the surface and finish off with a clean cloth wrung out of warm water.

Cover plaster of paris figures with a thick coating of starch and water, let it dry on the surface and the dirt will brush off with the dry powder.

If your corn does not pop well, it may be because it is old. Soak it in cold water for fifteen minutes, drain and try again. Better results will undoubtedly be obtained.

Worn brooms or whisks may be dipped into hot water and uneven edges trimmed with shears. This makes the straws harder, and the trimming makes the broom almost as good as new.

To keep an iron sink in good condition scrub once or twice a week with sandsoap and kerosene. Every night put a little chloride of lime over the strainer and pour through it a kettleful of boiling water.

Japanned ware should be washed with a sponge dampened in warm water and dried immediately with a soft cloth. Obstinate spots can quickly be removed by rubbing them with a woolen cloth dipped in a little sweet oil.

OBLIVIOUS MODERN AGE.

Fallacy of Devoting Thought to Things That Don't Matter.

It is a curious characteristic of this modern age that we are devoting nearly all our thought to things which do not really matter, and that we rarely confer serious consideration upon those phases and features of life which are so essential that it is impossible to escape from them, says Clayton Hamilton in the Forum. Thus, we are thinking a great deal about flying machines, which the world has managed fairly well to live without for many centuries. On the other hand, we cannot possibly live without our bodies; and yet we rarely consider how we may best develop them in efficiency and beauty, though this was one of the main preoccupations of the Greeks. Nowadays we are very fussy about getting from New York to Chicago in fewer hours than twenty-four, in order that we may economize that precious entity we call our time; but we seldom bother to consider our eternity. The men of the middle ages devoted their best thought to religion because they found that it was something that they could not possibly escape; now, for the same reason apparently, we ignore it and assume the attitude thus phrased by Mr. Chesterton—Everything matters except Everything. Another of those haunting realities which men cannot live without is language. Therefore, at certain periods, like the renaissance for instance, the world at large has devoted considerable thought to it. But in this oblivious age of ours language is pretty generally ignored; and just because a man is doomed to employ it every day of life he deems it unnecessary ever to think about it. In mere material and secondary matters we insist on having the best, but we have a vague sense that our way of speaking and of writing is good enough as it is, and may be allowed to take care of itself. Hence we seldom pause to examine the language we employ in our hourly concerns, to question its efficiency or to endeavor to develop it in form and fluency.

FOOD QUESTION

Settled with Perfect Satisfaction by a Dyspeptic.

It's not an easy matter to satisfy all the members of the family at meal time as every housewife knows.

And when the husband has dyspepsia and can't eat the simplest ordinary food without causing trouble, the food question becomes doubly annoying.

An Illinois woman writes:

"My husband's health was poor, he had no appetite for anything I could get for him, it seemed.

"He was hardly able to work, was taking medicine continually, and as soon as he would feel better would go to work again only to give up in a few weeks. He suffered severely with stomach trouble.

"Tired of everything I had been able to get for him to eat, one day seeing an advertisement about Grape-Nuts, I got some and he tried it for breakfast the next morning.

"We all thought it was pretty good, although we had no idea of using it regularly. But when my husband came home at night he asked for Grape-Nuts.

"It was the same next day and I had to get it right along, because when we would get to the table the question, 'Have you any Grape-Nuts?' was a regular thing. So I began to buy it by the dozen pkgs.

"My husband's health began to improve right along. I sometimes felt offended when I'd make something I thought he would like for a change, and still hear the same old question, 'Have you any Grape-Nuts?'

"He got so well that for the last two years he has hardly lost a day from his work, and we are still using Grape-Nuts." Read the book, "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs. "There's a Reason."

Ever read the above letter? A new one appears from time to time. They are genuine, true, and full of human interest.

The Redemption of David Corson

By CHARLES FREDERIC GOSS

CHAPTER VIII.

A little before dusk the three companions started upon their evening's business. The horses and carriage were waiting at the door and they mounted to their seats. David was embarrassed by the novelty of the situation, and Pepeeta by his presence; but the quack was in his highest spirits. He saluted the bystanders with easy familiarity, ostentatiously flung the hostler a coin, flourished his whip and excited universal admiration for his driving. During the turn which they took around the city for an advertisement, he indoctrinated his pupil with the principles of his art.

"People to-day are just what they were centuries ago. G-g-gull 'em just as easy. Make 'em think the moon is made of g-g-green cheese—way to catch larks is to p-p-pull the heavens down—extract sunbeams from c-c-cucumbers and all the rest! There's one master-weakness, Davy. They all think they are sick, or if they d-d-don't, you can make 'em!"

"What! Make a well man think he is sick?" the Quaker asked in astonishment.

"Sure! That's the secret of success. I can pick out the strongest man in the c-c-crowd and in five minutes have pains shooting through him like g-g-greased lightning. They are all like jumping-jacks to the man that knows them. You watch me pull the string and you-you'll see them wig-wig-wiggle."

"It seems a pity to take advantage of such weakness in our fellow men," said David, whose heart began to suffer qualms as he contemplated this rascality in his own connection with it.

"Fellow men! They are no fellows of mind. They are nuts for me to c-c-crack. They are oysters for me to open!" responded the quack, as he drove gaily into the public square and checked the horses, who stood with their proud necks arched, champing their bits and looking around at the crowd as if they shared their master's contempt.

Pepeeta descended from the carriage and made her way hastily into the tent which had already been pitched for her. The doctor lighted his torch and set his stock of goods while David, obeying his directions, began to move among the people to study their habits. Elbowing his way here and there, he contemplated the crowd in the light of the quack's philosophy, and as he did so received a series of painful mental shocks.

"The first principle in the art of painting a picture is to know where to sit down;" in other words, everything depends upon the point of view. Now that David began to look for evidences of the weaknesses and follies of his fellow men, he saw them everywhere. For the first time in his life he observed that startling prevalence of animal types which always communicates such a shock to the mind of him who has never discovered it before. Every countenance suddenly seemed to be the face of a beast, but thinly and imperfectly veiled. There were foxes and tigers and wolves, there were bulldogs and monkeys and swine. He had always seen, or thought he saw, upon the foreheads of his fellow men some evidence of that divinity which had been communicated to them when God breathed into the great first father the breath of life; but now he shuddered at the sight of those thick lips and drooping jaws, those dull or crafty eyes, those sullen, sodden, gargoyle features, as men do at beholding monstrosities.

A few weeks ago he would have felt a profound pity at this discovery, but so rapid and radical had been the alteration in his feelings that he was now seized by a sudden revulsion and contempt. "Are these creatures really men?" he asked himself. He stood there among them taller, straighter, keener, handsomer than them all, and the old feelings that have made men aristocrats and tyrants in every age of the world, surged in his heart and hardened it against them.

By this time the quack had finished his few simple preparations, and, standing erect before his audience, began the business of the evening. Having observed the habits of the game, David now chose a favorable position to study those of the hunter. He watched with an almost breathless interest every expression upon that sinister face and listened with a boundless interest to every word that fell from those treacherous lips.

He was not long in justifying the quack's honest criticism of his own oratory. His voice lacked the vibrant tones of a musical instrument and his rhetoric that fluency, without which the highest efforts of eloquence can never be attined. By speaking very slowly and deliberately he avoided stammering, but this always acted like a dragging anchor upon the movement of his thought. These were radical defects, but in every other respect he was a consummate artist. He arrested the attention of his hearers with an inimitable skill and held it with an irresistible power.

His piercing eye noted every expression on the faces of his hearers, and seemed to read the inmost secrets of their hearts. He perceived the slightest inclination to purchase, and was as keen to see a hand steal towards a pocket-book as a cat to see a mouse steal out of its hole.

He coaxed, he wheedled, he bantered, he abused—he even threatened. He fulfilled his promise to the letter, "to make the well men think that they were sick," and many a stalwart frontiersman whose body was as sound as an ox, began to be conscious of racking pains. Nor were those legitimate arts of oratory the only ones which this arch-knave practiced.

"I gave you two dollars, and you only gave me change for one," cried a thin-faced, stoop-shouldered, helpless-looking fellow, who had just purchased a bottle of the "Balm of the Blessed Islands."

With lightning-like legerdemain the quack had shuffled this bill to the bottom of his pile, and lifting up the one that lay on top, exposed it to the view of his audience.

"That's a lie!" he said, in his slow, impressive manner. "There is always such a man as this in every crowd. Some one is always trying to take advantage of those who, like myself, are living for the public good. Gentlemen, you saw me lay the b-b-bill he gave me down upon the top! Here it is; judge for yourselves. That is a bad man! Beware of him!"

The bold effrontery of the quack silenced the timid customer, who could only blush and look confused. His blushes and confusion condemned him and the crowd hustled him away from the wagon. They believed him guilty and he half believed it of himself.

David, who had seen the bill and knew the victim's innocence but not the doctor's fraud, pressed forward to defend him. The quack stopped and silenced him with an inimitable wink, and then instantly and with consummate art diverted his audience with a series of droll stories which he always reserved for emergencies like this. They were old and thread-bare, but this was the reason he chose them. He had one for every circumstance and occasion.

There was a man standing in an outer circle of the crowd around whose forehead was a bandage. "Come here, my friend," said the quack. "How did you get this wound? Don't want to tell? Oh! well, that is natural. A horse kicked him, no doubt; never got in a row! No! No! Couldn't any one hit him! Reminds me of the man who saw a big black-and-blue spot on his boy's forehead. 'My son,' said he, 'I thought I told you not to fight? How did you get this wound?' 'I bit it, father,' replied the boy.

"'Bit it!' exclaimed the old man in astonishment, 'how could you bite yourself upon the forehead?'

"'I climbed onto a chair,' says he.

"And you have been climbing on a chair to bite your forehead, too, my friend?" he asked with humorous gravity, while a loud guffaw went up from the crowd.

"Well," he continued, soothingly, "whether you did it or not, just let me rub a little of this b-b-balm upon it, and by to-morrow morning it will be well. There! That's right. One dollar is all it costs. You don't want it? What the d-d-deuce did you let me open the bottle for? I'll leave it to the crowd if that is fair? There, that is right. Pay for it like a man. It's worth double its price. Thank you. By to-morrow noon you will b-b-be sending me a testimonial to its value."

The novelty of the scene, the skill of the principal actor, the rapid growth of the piles of coin and bills, the frantic desire of the people to be gulled, all served to obscure those elements which were calculated to appeal to the Quaker's conscience. He felt like one awakened from a dream. While he was still in the half dozed condition of such an awakening, the quack gave him a sign that this part of his lesson was ended, and following the direction of the thumb which he threw over his shoulder towards Pepeeta's tent, he eagerly took his way thither.

Before the door stood several groups of young men and maidens, talking under their breath. Now and then a couple disentangled itself from the crowd, and with visible trepidation entered. As they reappeared, their friends gathered about them and besought them to disclose the secrets they had discovered.

Some of them giggled and simpered, others laughed boisterously and skeptically, while others still, looked scared and anxious. It was evident that even those who tried to make light of what they had seen and heard were moved by something awe-inspiring.

David listened to their silly talk, observed their bold demeanor and their vulgar manners, while the impression of weakness, of stupidity, of the lowness and bestiality of humanity made upon his mind by the aged and the mature, was intensified by his observation of the young and callow.

From the outside of the gypsy's tent he could make but few discoveries of her method; and he waited impatiently until the last curious couple had departed. When they had disappeared, he entered.

At the opposite side of the tent and reclining upon a low divan was the gypsy. Above her head a tallow candle was burning dimly. Before her was a rough table covered with a shawl, upon which were scattered cups of tea with floating grounds, ivory, dice, cards, coins and other implements of the "Black Art."

Pepeeta sprang to her feet when she saw who her visitor was, and exhibited the clearest signs of agitation. David's own emotions were not less violent, for although the gypsy's surroundings were poor and mean, they served rather to enhance than to diminish her exquisite beauty. Her shoulders and arms were bare, and on her wrists were gold bracelets of writhing serpents in whose eyes gleamed diamonds. On her fingers and in her ears were other costly stones. Her dress was silk, and rustled when she moved, with soft and sibilant sounds.

"The doctor has sent me here to study the methods by which you do your work," said David, approaching the table and gazing at her with undisguised admiration.

"You should have come before. How can you study my methods when I am not practicing them? And any way, you have no faith in them. Have you? I always had until I heard your sermon in the little meeting house."

"And have you lost it now?"

"It has been sadly shaken."

"You can at least show me how you practice the art, even if you have lost your faith in it. I too have lost a faith; but we must live. What are these cards for?"

"If you wish me to show you, you may shuffle and cut them, but I would rather tell your fortune by your hand, for I have more faith in palmistry than in cards."

He extended his hand; she took it, and with her right forefinger began to trace the lines. Her gaze had that intensity with which a little child peers into the mechanism of a watch or an astronomer into the depths of space. A thrill of emotion shot through the frame of the Quaker at the touch of those delicate and beautiful fingers.

Neither of them spoke. The delicate finger of the gypsy moved over the lines of the palm like that of a little school-girl over the pages of a primer. They did not realize how dangerous was that proximity, nor how fatal that touch. Through those two poles of Nature's most powerful battery, the magnetic and mysterious current of love was passing.

"Let me now examine the lines," she said. "Here is the line of the heart. It passes clear across the palm. It is well marked at every point and is most pronounced upon the upper side. But look! it is joined to the head below the finger of Saturn. It is the sign of a violent death!"

As she uttered this exclamation, she pressed the hand convulsively between her own, and looked up into his face. The involuntary and sudden action recalled him to his consciousness. "What did you say?" he asked.

"Have you not been listening?" she replied, repressing both her anxiety and her annoyance.

"No; was it a good story or a bad one which you were reading?"

"It was both."

"Well—it is no matter, those accidental marks can have no significance."

"Why should not the character and destiny of the man disclose itself in signs and marks upon his hands?"

As they stood confronting each other, they would have presented a study of equal interest to the artist or to the philosopher. There was both a poem and a picture in their attitude. Grace and beauty revealed themselves on every feature and in every movement. They had arrived at one of those dramatic points in their life-journey, where all the tragic elements of existence seem to converge. Agitated by incomprehensible and delicious emotions, confronting insoluble problems, longing, hoping, fearing, they hovered over the ocean of life like two tiny sparrows swept out to sea by a tempest.

They were awakened from their reveries by the footsteps of the quack, and by his raucous voice summoning them back into the world of realities from which they had withdrawn so completely.

"Well, little wife," he said, "how is b-b-business?"

"Fair," she said, gathering up a double hand-full of change and passing it over to him indifferently.

The question fell upon the ears of the Quaker like a thunder bolt. It was to him the first intimation that Pepeeta was not the daughter of the quack. "His wife!" The heart of the youth sank in his bosom. Here was a new and unexpected complication. What should he do? It was too late to turn back now. The die had been cast, and he must go forward.

ZEPPELIN'S LIFE STORY.

Hardships Almost Unbelievable During Years of Experiments.

Of all the men now engaged in the study of aviation, none has had a more interesting career than Count Zeppelin, whose flights of nearly a thousand miles broke all previous records. Until success came, his hardships were almost unbelievable, and he spent the whole of his fortune in carrying out his experiments. His first interest in aerial flight probably dates from the American Civil War, when he made an ascent in a captive balloon to watch the operations. After this he returned to Germany in time for the Franco-German War, and is said to have been the first German soldier who crossed the frontier into France. When peace was restored, he determined to give his whole life to aeronautics, and in a comparatively short time he spent £30,000 in what appeared to be almost fruitless effort. At one time he was so poor through his devotion to his work that he had to live in a little cottage on an allowance made to him by his friends. But his invincible pluck brought success at last, and one of the first to recognize his genius was the Kaiser himself.

Although he is considerably more than 70, Count Zeppelin is still as active as most men only half his age. A German newspaper has described him as follows: "He stands tall and upright; he has an agile body capable of unusual exertion, a constitution sturdy through much exercise and simple habits, and an immense power of mental concentration. He is always amiable, modest and deliberate. His workmen are devoted to him heart and soul." Through all his many failures, and during the dark time when his nearest friends looked upon him as next door to a madman, the Count has had the continual help and counsel of his wife, and, even when her husband's experiments brought her to the verge of poverty, she still had perfect faith in him, and never murmured. It must have been a proud day for the Countess when the King and Queen of Wurtemberg took a trip in the Count's airship, and a prouder day still when the Kaiser called her husband "the greatest German of the twentieth century."

Not the least vexing of Zeppelin's worries has been the statement that the real inventor of the Zeppelin airship was not the Count at all, but a deceased Hungarian engineer. It was stated that this man's widow used to receive a pension from Zeppelin in consideration of the fact that she had sold the secret of her late husband's invention to a syndicate of which the Count was the head. This story has received a good deal of attention by the Count's enemies, and it was even rumored some time ago that Zeppelin was about to fight a duel with a certain officer because the latter had publicly asserted the truth of the Hungarian engineer story. Of course, no well informed people believe these absurd rumors; and to-day, not only by Germany, but by every other civilized country, the Count is regarded as one of the greatest inventors the world has ever seen.—Boston Transcript.

A Farmer's Troubles.

"I dunno how to please these summer boarders."

"What's the matter, Si?"

"They're clamoring for the moss-covered bucket after I had fitted up the well with sterilized drinking cups instead."—Washington Herald.

Sure to Do It.

"He is such a lazy man that he took to manufacturing fans as the easiest way of making a living.

"The easiest way?"

"Sure. Isn't it certain to raise the wind?"—Baltimore American.

WEATHER BUREAU'S VALUE DESCRIBED BY ITS CHIEF.

SINCE the year 1895 Willis L. Moore has been at the head of the United States weather bureau, the greatest institution of its kind in the world. Under his direction the work of supplying forecasts of the weather has expanded until it now employs 200 men in different parts of the United States, who send twice a day to the national capital the principal facts about the weather—velocity of the wind, temperature, rainfall, barometric readings and other details, at a cost of $1,500,000 a year. In an interview with James B. Morrow, published in the New York Tribune, Professor Moore, after deprecating popular superstitions concerning weather forecasts by such means as the goose bone, the thickness of husks on corn and the singing of catydids, tells of his work. The interview in part follows:

"Do sailors and ship owners rely on your forecasts?"

"Absolutely, on the Great Lakes; also on the rivers and very generally along the oceans by mariners engaged in coastwise business. The captains of ships on the northern lakes depend on us to a larger degree than do other sailors, because we can more accurately predict the velocity of the wind than we can foretell a storm of rain, which occasionally changes its path and goes somewhere else. Remember, that where the pressure of the air is greatest upon the earth it will flow to where the pressure is the least—precisely like water going down stream. Our instruments of measurement are so perfect that we can figure out the velocity of the wind at certain places several hours in advance—knowing the high pressure in one region and the low pressure elsewhere. We foretell wind storms on the lakes, while along the Atlantic Coast we give warnings about West Indian hurricanes.

"On two occasions, after warnings of severe storms had been given, our men saw all the customs officers on the seaboard, from Maine to Florida. We found that ships valued at $66,000,000, taking no account of the cargoes, had remained in the various ports until the storms were over. Authorities outside of the bureau have estimated that a West Indian hurricane—which, by the way, is the most dangerous general storm we ever have—sweeping the Atlantic Coast without warning would destroy property to the value of from $3,000,000 to $5,000,000. I send ten men to different points in the West Indies each year just before the hurricane season opens, where they remain until all danger is over. They report to us daily by telegraph. At the end of the season they nail up their stations and come home.

"While we are on the subject," Professor Moore continued, "I would like to say, in order to clear up the confusion of the public mind which leads to an absurd mixing of terms, that a cyclone has an area of 1,000 miles, a hurricane an area from 100 to 300 miles and a tornado, which invariably occurs in the southeast quarter of a cyclone and is an incident of the cyclone, an area of from 1,000 feet to 1,000 yards. The velocity of the wind during a cyclone is from fifteen to twenty-five miles an hour, during a hurricane it varies from fifty to 100 miles an hour, while it is so great during a tornado that no instrument can measure it. In all three kinds of storms the wind, of course, is rotary, or twisting, as it is commonly described.

"But the weather bureau," Professor Moore went on to say, "is not alone of value to people in the matter of wind storms, but is of tremendous service in foretelling periods of flood. Twice we forecast the height of the Mississippi River at New Orleans—beating the flood five days in one instance and a week in the other. On both occasions our mathematics covered a tremendous area of the United States."

"Is your bureau of any practical service to farmers?"

"By means of the system of rural free delivery of mail our forecasts go each day into the homes of 1,000,000 farmers. As many more farmers get our forecasts by telephone. As a matter of fact, thousands of farmers put telephones into their homes for no other reason than to be informed about the weather—our forecasts, you understand, being for the day on which they are made and practically for the day following. We have been of great service to the cranberry growers of Wisconsin, the cane growers of Louisiana and the orange growers of Florida in giving warnings against frost. Cranberry marshes are flooded, cane is quickly cut and piled in windrows and smudges are started in orange groves as effective measures of protection. Let me add," Professor Moore went on to say, "that the train dispatchers of all the railroads in the country get our morning and evening forecasts, and thus are enabled to know about the coming cold waves in winter and each year to save millions of dollars' worth of perishable merchandise such as fruits, vegetables, certain kinds of chemicals and other manufactures."

SOME MARRIED MEDITATIONS.

By Clarence L. Cullen.

The average fat woman would rather have you call her a murderess than to say that she waddles.

"Money makes the mare go," but what member of the mare's family goes out and gets the money?

The woman who essays to hold her husband by a short-strapped halter needs first to be pretty sure of her halter's material.

The so-termed "intuition" of women doesn't prevent a lot of them from picking out mere four-flushing grandstand players as spouses.

A man is just as proud of his wife when she goes out with him in an entirely new and nifty set of scenery as she is in wearing the things.

Why is it that some married women sniff contemptuously when they read about a man who has killed himself because his wife has refused to return to him?

Ever notice how, after you've once told a woman that she has a roseate mouth, she keeps biting her lips and twiddling them with her fingers all the time to keep 'em red?

When a woman looks mad, when she hears that song, "I Love My Wife, but Oh, You Kid!" it's fairly safe to conclude that everything isn't exactly as it should be up at her house.

Did you ever suffer a certain whimsy little pang over the promptness with which your normally forgetful wife reminds you to pay your life insurance dues when the time comes 'round?

You may know that a woman has developed elephantiasis of the skypiece over the imaginary beauties of her "figger" when she wears a pair of these tight-laced tube corsets underneath her bathing suit.

A new thought woman of our acquaintance tells us that she can "will" her husband to come home immediately from anywhere she wants to. Apparently, though, she never wants to, for he always comes home just about when he gets ready to.

A POPULAR SUPERSTITION.

Origin and Basis for Belief in Ill-Luck of Friday.

The bad luck supposed to attach to Friday is said to be traceable to the worship of the goddess Freya, the Venus of the north, who felt herself slighted if anyone began a journey on this, her festival. In punishment for the dishonor thus brought upon her Freya was wont to direct misfortune to assail the offender, so that it came to be thought that Friday was an unlucky time to embark on any enterprise, although most marriages in Scotland are said to take place on that day. In Walsh's "Curiosities of Popular Customs," is told the story of the brig, Friday, of Wilmington, whose builder defied superstition by giving her this whimsical name and launching her on Friday. He also sent her upon her first voyage upon the sixth day of the week, but on the succeeding Friday a home-bound vessel "saw the hull of the brig pitching heavily in the trough of the sea, while her crew ran about the deck, cutting loose the wreck of the mast that dragged and bumped alongside." This was the last of the "Friday," concerning whose fate the shipbuilder's wife merely said when she heard of it: "I told thee so, Isaac. This is all thy sixth-day doings. Now thee sees the consequences."

Another reason for the supposed unluckiness of Friday lies in the crucifixion of Jesus on that day. It is from a similar historical source, indeed, that the "thirteen" superstition is believed to have sprung; a natural distaste grew up for the number representing the circle of the disciples with the addition of Judas. Yet it seems as if by this time the world might be willing to forget its ancient superstitions and regard every day and every number with equal respect.—Providence Journal.

Aboreal Freaks.

Among the curiosities of tree life is the sofar, or whistling tree, of Nubia. When the winds blow over this tree it gives out flute-like sounds, playing away to the wilderness for hours at a time strange, weird melodies. It is the spirit of the dead singing among the branches, the natives say, but the scientific white man says that the sounds are due to a myriad of small holes which an insect bores in the spines of the branches.

The weeping tree of the Canary Islands is another arboreal freak. This tree in the dryest weather will rain down showers from its leaves, and the natives gather up the water from the pool formed at the foot of the trunk, and find it pure and fresh. The tree exudes the water from innumerable pores situated at the base of the leaves.

Playing Cards in Moscow.

In Moscow playing cards are sold only by the municipal government, and the vast income derived from that source is applied toward the maintenance of orphan asylums.

"So you want to marry my daughter, eh?" "Yes, sir. We are sure we can get along together." "Yes, but are you sure you can get along with her mother?"—Detroit Free Press.

FAITHFUL ENGLISH SERVANTS.

Theories Regarding Modern Domestics Routed by Facts.

People who hold that the modern servant is a creature chock full of a total depravity which makes her—or him—unable to stay in one place longer than it takes her—or him—to become really useful, ought to read the records of the Domestic Servants' Benevolent Institution, an English society, says an exchange. On its books are names of several hundred servants, each of whom has been with the same employer for more than fifty years. William Sly, secretary of the society, says that his experience has convinced him that when servants are well treated they seek few changes.

One of these faithful servants was Hannah Jane Cook, who died recently at the age of 93 and who had been in one family since her seventeenth year. The death notice inserted in the papers by her employers called her a "most faithful friend," and as such, rather than as a servant, she was always regarded. Miss Caroline Chipp, also on the books of the society, is supposed to be the oldest domestic servant living. She is 101 years of age and eighty of these years have been spent in the service of one family. Susan O'Hagan, who died last January at the age of 107 years, had served three generations of the Hall family of Lisburn, Ireland.

Some touching instances of love and devotion come to light in the annals of these old English servants. One there was whose mistress was ruined by a bank failure. The mistress told the old domestic with great regret that she couldn't afford to keep her any longer. "Well, ma'am," said the woman, "then I'll just keep thee. I've saved up all my wages and I've got enough." And till her death, some years later, the former employer lived with this woman like a sister and was cared for by her at her expense in great comfort.

Where They Came From.

It is surprising from whence come the most common articles of food. The onion, the leek, garlic, and pea were favorites in Egypt; rye and parsley in Siberia; the citron and currants in Greece, and radishes hail from China and Japan.

The horse chestnut is a native of Tibet, the "Forbidden Land;" and the mulberry tree, walnut, and peach traveled westward from Persia. Very few consider that oats originated in North Africa at a time when Egypt was the granary of the world.

The chestnut came from Italy, celery from Germany, spinach from Arabia, the sunflower from Peru, and cucumber from India. Tobacco is a native of Virginia.

Scotland's Emblem.

The Danes made it a rule never to attack an enemy by night, on account of its cowardice, but upon one occasion they broke this rule. On they crept, barefooted, noiselessly and unobserved, when one of them stepped on a thistle, which made him cry out in pain. Alarmed by the cry, the Scotch fell upon the party and defeated them with fearful slaughter. Ever since the thistle has been adopted as the emblem of Scotland.

And if you are afraid to ask for what you want the chances are that some one will hand you a lemon.

There are too many people who look upon their friends solely as a soft place to land.

FLASHES OF FUN

"I've never known a woman yet who wished she was 40." "I have—she was 50."—Boston Transcript.

Stella—Did he say he loved you in so many words? Bella—Yes, seventeen pages.—New York Sun.

"Is she making him a good wife?" "Well, not exactly; but she's making him a good husband."—London Answers.

Bluff—I look upon you, sir, as a rascal. Biff—You are privileged to look upon me in any character you desire to assume—Vogue.

He—You don't know how nervous I was when I proposed to you. She—And you don't know how nervous I was until you did so.

Mrs. Church—You say she was a war correspondent once? Mrs. Gotham—Yes, she was secretary of a woman's club.—Yonkers Statesman.

"Who gave the bride away?" "Her little brother. He stood up right in the middle of the ceremony and yelled, 'Hurrah, Fanny, you've got him at last!'"—Tit Bits.

"But you spent enough money on me before we were married," protested his wife. "True, my dear," replied her husband. "I had it to spend then."—Chicago Daily News.

Mrs. Sauers—I don't consider marriage a lottery. Do you? Mr. Sauers—No! If a man draws a blank in a lottery he can tear it up and take another chance.—Puck.

Visitor—Can you read the past? Fortune Teller—Certainly; that's my business. "Then I wish you'd tell me what it was my wife told me to get for her."—Boston Globe.

"What is your idea of happiness?" "To be able to spend my own money just as if I were going to turn in an expense account when I got home."—Chicago Record-Herald.

She offered an explanation of her tearful mood. "I've been to a wedding," she said. "I always cry more at a wedding than I do at a funeral. It's so much more uncertain."

Patience—She says she married him to reform him. Beatrice—And he says he was a fool when he married her. "Well, she says she hasn't reformed him a bit."—Yonkers Statesman.

He—I wonder if we can get along all right. She—Certainly. We can buy the auto with the money father left me and you will surely make enough to pay for running it, don't you think?

Leading Tragic Man—Did you see how I paralyzed the audience in the death scene? They were crying all over the house! Stage Manager—Yes, they knew you weren't really dead.—Tit-Bits.

A—I used a word in speaking to my wife which offended her surely a week ago. She has not spoken a syllable to me since. B—Would you mind telling me what it was?—Fliegende Blaetter.

"Is there any difference in the meaning of the words 'nautical' and 'marine'?" asked Mr. Malaprop. "Not much," replied Mrs. Malaprop. "One is a cinnamon of the other."—Chicago Record-Herald.

"Am I the first girl you ever loved?" "Your question pains me." "Forgive me." "Yes; I had flattered myself that there was nothing amateurish about my love-making."—Louisville Courier-Journal.

Mrs. Peachblow—Why does your husband carry such a tremendous amount of life insurance when he's in such perfect health? Mrs. Flicker—Oh, just to tantalize me. Men are naturally cruel.—Life.

"Jack sent me a handsome mirror for my birthday." "Oh, that accounts for it." "Accounts for what?" "Yesterday he asked me if a woman ever got too old to be pleased with a looking glass."—Boston Transcript.

"No, Mr. Sparks, I can never marry you. You have no consideration for the feelings of my mother." "Why, what makes you think that?" "You hung your hat over the keyhole before you started to propose to me."—Cleveland Leader.

Undertaker—You will, of course, ride in the first coach with your mother-in-law? Widower—Is that absolutely necessary? Undertaker—Oh, yes, certainly; it is the correct thing. Widower—Then all I can say is that my whole day's enjoyment is spoilt!

English Clergyman—And when you arrive in London, my dear lady, don't fail to see St. Paul's and Westminster Abbey. Fair American—You bet; I'll rattle those off sure; but what I've been hankering to see, ever since I was knee-high to a grasshopper, is the Church of England!—Punch.

She—Oh, Jack, do excuse me for getting here so late. You poor fellow, you've had to wait an hour for me. He—Oh, no, it's all right. I've only just come. She (sharply)—What! So that's the way you treat me, is it? If I'd come at the time agreed you'd have made me wait a whole hour. (Pouts.)—Boston Transcript.

"I hope you don't mind my asking," said a woman, diffidently, "but should I call you professor or doctor?" "Oh, call me anything you like," was the great man's rejoinder. "Some people call me an old idiot." "Really?" the lady murmured with sweet innocence. "But, then, they would be people who knew you intimately."—London Spare Moments.

Pecan Culture.

Pecan nuts are grown successfully in several States, but mainly in those States south of parallel 40. Forty feet is generally the distance apart of the trees. If the triangular method of planting is adopted forty trees can be grown to the acre. Pecan trees may bear a few nuts at an early age, but paying crops cannot be expected under ten years and full crops under twenty. The annual yield of a tree in full bearing has been variously reported at from one to twenty bushels.

The Food of Vim and Energy

One plateful of MOTHER'S OATS will produce more vim and vigor and energy and action—more vitality, more enthusiasm and more endurance, than many times the same bulk of meat, fish, fowl, or cereals of lower food value. MOTHER'S OATS are different from other's oats and different from ordinary oatmeal. They are put up in sanitary sealed packages. But there's more to MOTHER'S OATS than the package; they are the best oats in the world, the best selection of the best crops. Every batch that comes to our mills is screened and only the ripe, big grains are marketed. They are not only sterilized, but steamed (to burst the proteid cells); then rolled (to render the cooking easy), and after that, MOTHER'S OATS are crushed (to hasten their digestion)—easy work for the stove, easy work for the stomach and more work for the man. There's a coupon in every package of Mother's Cereals. You can collect enough of them in a little while to own a Fireless Cooker for nothing. Your grocer will tell you how to get it free. There are a number of ways and all of them make it worth while to buy Mother's Cereals: Mother's Oats, Mother's Corn Meal (white or yellow), Mother's Wheat Hearts (the cream of the wheat), Mother's Hominy Grits, Mother's Corn Flakes (toasted), Mother's Coarse Pearl Hominy, Mother's Old Fashioned Steel Cut Oatmeal, Mother's Old Fashioned Graham Flour.

FREE TO YOU—MY SISTER

Free to You and Every Sister Suffering From Woman's Ailments.

I am a woman.
I know woman's sufferings.
I have found the cure.

I will mail, free of any charge, my home treatment with full instructions to any sufferer from women's ailments. I want to tell all women about this cure—you, my reader, for yourself, your daughter, your mother, or your sister. I want to tell you how to cure yourselves at home without the help of a doctor. Men cannot understand women's sufferings. What we women know from experience, we know better than any doctor. I know that my home treatment is a safe and sure cure for Leucorrhœa or Whitish discharges, Ulceration, Displacement or Falling of the Womb, Profuse, Scanty or Painful Periods, Uterine or Ovarian Tumors or Growths; also pains in the head, back and bowels, bearing down feelings, nervousness, creeping feeling up the spine, melancholy, desire to cry, hot flashes, weariness, kidney and bladder troubles where caused by weaknesses peculiar to our sex.

I want to send you a complete ten days' treatment entirely free to prove to you that you can cure yourself at home, easily, quickly and surely. Remember, that it will cost you nothing to give the treatment a complete trial; and if you should wish to continue, it will cost you only about 12 cents a week, or less than two cents a day. It will not interfere with your work or occupation. Just send me your name and address, tell me how you suffer if you wish, and I will send you the treatment for your case, entirely free, in plain wrapper, by return mail. I will also send you free of cost, my book—"WOMAN'S OWN MEDICAL ADVISER" with explanatory illustrations showing why women suffer, and how they can easily cure themselves at home. Every woman should have it, and learn to think for herself. Then when the doctor says—"You must have an operation," you can decide for yourself. Thousands of women have cured themselves with my home remedy. It cures all, old or young. To Mothers of Daughters, I will explain a simple home treatment which speedily and effectually cures Leucorrhœa, Green Sickness and Painful or Irregular Menstruation in Young Ladies. Plumpness and health always result from its use.

Wherever you live, I can refer you to ladies of your own locality who know and will gladly tell any sufferer that this Home Treatment really cures all women's diseases, and makes women well, strong, plump and robust. Just send me your address, and the free ten days' treatment is yours, also the book. Write today, as you may not see this offer again. Address

Lived 152 Years

Wm. Parr—England's oldest man—married the third time at 120, worked in the fields till 132 and lived 20 years longer. People should be youthful at 80. James Wright, of Srurlock, Ky., shows how to remain young. "I feel just like a 16-year-old boy," he writes, after taking six bottles of Electric Bitters. For thirty years Kidney trouble made life a burden, but the first bottle of this wonderful medicine convinced me I had found the greatest cure on earth." They're a godsend to weak, sickly rundown or old people. Try them. 50c at Stone's drug store. 44-1m

Moores

Rev. Overmeyer, of Waterloo, will give a temperance lecture at the church, Saturday evening, illustrated by a series of pictures. Everybody invited to attend.

Miss Nellie LaTier spent a few days with friends at Auburn, last week.

Mr. and Mrs. John Oiler spent Sunday with Mr. Luce and family at Waterloo.

Mrs. Eva Long and son, Kenneth, of near Edon, were guests of Fred Bunge and family last week.

Mr. and Mrs. Howard Wilson and son, of Kendallville, were the guests of Thomas Lysher and family, Sunday.

Earl Troop and family are moving this week near Fremont, their former home. Asa Shafer and family, of Auburn, will then live on Mr. Moore's farm.

The dredge has now crossed the Vandalia track.

Miss Eva Allbright spent Friday and Saturday with her sister, Mrs. Marvin Stroh.

Wm. Smurr had his hand quite badly injured Mr. Keller's corn husker at John Mutzfeld's, Friday. Dr. Acker was called to dress the hand.

Won't Slight A Good Friend

"If ever I need a cough medicine again I know what to get," declares Mrs. A. L. Alley of Beals, Me., "for, after using ten bottles of Dr. King's New Discovery, and seeing its excellent results in my own family and others, I am convinced it is the best medicine made for Coughs, Colds and lung trouble." Every one who tries it feels just that way. Relief is felt at once and its quick cure surprises you. For Bronchitis, Asthma, Hemorrhage, Croup, LaGrippe, Sore Throat, pain in chest or lungs its supreme. 50c and $1.00. Trial bottle free. Guaranteed by Stone's drug store 44-1m

CURES REMOVE DOUBT ABOUT ECZEMA CURE

Read What Your Druggist Says About Oil of Wintergreen Compound

Druggist S. G. Stone submits the following to the readers of the HERALD:

For several years we have announced, with our recommendation, that we had found a positive cure for eczema; a simple skin wash, oil of wintergreen compounded with other healing ingredients.

Yet we know there are people right in this town who have eczema and still have never tried this remedy.

We have, therefore, arranged with the D. D. D. Laboratories of Chicago for a special offer of a trial bottle at 25 cents instead of the $1.00 bottle as regularly sold.

We offer this trial bottle with our recommendation and assurance that just as soon as the patient washes his itching skin, this mild liquid will take the itch away instantly. S. G. Stone, Druggist, Butler, Ind.

Mrs. Wm. LaTier and daughter, Nellie, of Moores Station, were recent visitors at Hiram Moores'.

The L. A. S. of the U. B. church will give a chicken pie supper Friday evening, Nov. 5, at the H. K. Leas building. Supper from 5 to 8. A full square meal for 20 cents. Come and bring your best girl.

The play "Home Lights" at the opera house last Tuesday night was just fine. The Waterloo girls know how to do things up right.

Frank Meyers returned last Thursday from an extended trip through the western states selling pianos. He reports success and a fine country.

Miss Cassie Ettinger recently returned from a summer's vacation at Coldwater, Mich., where she has an interest in business.

Mrs. Henry Rohm came home Friday from Nebraska where she had been visiting friends in different parts of the state.

Mrs. Sarah Edge is not improving as fast as her many friends could wish. She has been quite sick the last few weeks.

There seemed to be a merry-go-round party in town Saturday night sowing corn. What might have been their harvest no one knows if they had gone a little farther with it as some of the parties were known.

Spencerville

The sick in this locality is getting better at this writing.

Mark Morr and wife called on L. R. Wasson Sunday.

Hal Jackson and wife visited with his brother, Bert and family, Sunday.

John Means and wife were calling on the sick Sunday.

Some of the boys cut up some fine fandangoes Saturday night. Boys you had better be careful what you do. Fun is fun, but some of you went too far. Be careful hereafter.

Manford Smith and wife were over Hicksville, Sunday.

J. Whitehurst was in Auburn, Monday.

Frank and Lew Grieft and their wives visited with friends here from Saturday till Monday.

Miss Sylva Carr, of Defiance, was the guest of Burl Enzor and wife, Saturday and Sunday.

There will be a box social at the schoolhouse, Saturday, November 6. The proceeds will go to buy library book. Everybody invited.

Mr. and Mrs. DeLong and Misses Opal anh Bessie DeLong, of Corunna, spent from Saturday till Monday with Mr. Traxler's.

M. F. Moore, Druggist

A druggist at Westmoreland, Kans., M. F. Moore by name, writes that he can get affidavits from customers saying that they were cured of chronic constipation, indigestion, etc., by the use of Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin, the great laxative and tonic. He says further, that he has been a druggist for 25 years, but has never known of a better remedy for these troubles than Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin, which he also uses in his own family. It is absolutely guaranteed to do all that is claimed, and if you want to try it before buying, send your address for a free sample bottle to Pepsin Syrup Co., 119 Caldwell Bldg., Monticello, Ill. It is sold by all druggists at 50c and $1 a bottle. 44-1m

For Female Ills

You should take, for female ills, a medicine which acts on the female organs and functions.

Cardui is not a man's medicine. It is for women. Its pure, healing, curative, vegetable ingredients, go direct to the womanly organs, relieve their pain and inflammation, and build up their strength.

"Tongue cannot tell," writes Miss Nola Smith, of Sweetser, Ind., "what

WINE OF CARDUI

Stafford and East Wilmington

A Mr. Miller and wife, of near Waterloo, occupy the tenant house on the farm of E. B. Nimmons. We are informed that Mr. Nimmons has hired Mr. Miller to work for him on his farm.

Some of those interested in Buck Creek had a meeting in Auburn a week ago last Saturday and one in Butler last Saturday. What the objects of these meetings were the writer is not informed of.

Recently Joseph Wilson decorated his wind mill which has done good service for more than twenty years, with a new wheel. The wheel was furnished by the Butler Co.

Week before last the Seeman threshing machine finished several jobs of threshing in Stafford. The threshing of grain and clover seed is about done for this year. The seed crop was the smallest for many years.

Corn husking is now in progress whenever the weather and fodder is in proper condition for husking. Much of the fodder is in poor condition this year on account of frosts and wind storms.

Henry Grube has become the owner of what for many years was known as the James Gaff farm. It suits Mr. Grube nicely, as it is close to the farm on which he lives. Mr. Grube now has four farms or about 450 acres of land.

The wheat is likely to get a fair start this year before winter sets in. One of the best fields seen by your correspondent is on the farm of Mr. Reynolds, east of Butler.

John Reinhart says there is Sunday school every Sunday and preaching once in two weeks at Best's Corners.

Philip Ramsey is reported slightly better and able to be up some, but very feeble.

Wm. Wilson moved to Edon Monday where he has bought property for a home. Mr. Wilson has moved quite often in the last seven years and it seems the time for him to move again had come.

Recently the Auburn Courier published a paragraph reflecting severely on our court house item. In it the Courier alledged that your correspondent was the only farmer opposed to the building of a court house in the near future. If the matter could be voted on by the people of DeKalb county the Courier man might be surprised of the result.

Kills To Stop The Fiend

The worst foe for 12 years of John Deye, of Gladwin, Mich., was a running ulcer. He paid doctors over $400 without benefit. Then Bucklen,s Arnica Salve killed the ulcer and cured him. Edgerton

Dr. Hathaway was in Butler on business last Monday.

Fred Mavis, of Ashley, was in Edgerton last Saturday.

Mabel Fusselman, of Bryan, spent over Sunday with her parents in Edgerton.

M. F. Long, of Butler, was in Edgerton on business last Monday.

J. A. Jinnings was at Auburn and Fort Wayne on business last Thursday.

Mrs. L. A. Knight was operated on in the Catholic hospital at Fort Wayne last Wednesday for rupture. The operation was successful and at last account she was doing nicely.

Mr. Hazen, of Butler, was in Edgerton on business last Monday.

William Mast started for Philbrook, Montana, last Tuesday to go hunting and visit C. M. Harris.

Arthur Gillis, of Kendallville, wa home to vote last Tuesday, returning Wednesday.

The election last Tuesday was a badly mixed up affair, both sides electing part of the ticket.

The L. S. & M. S. is working men nights at the sink at Mina.

Mrs. Ewers returned home last Saturday. She brought her mother with her who is in poor health.

Mr. Youse, of Bryan, was in Edgerton last Monday.

The sink on the L. S. & M. S. at Mina is still going down. It went down nine inches last Saturday, the most in any one day yet. They have put in twenty feet of dirt already. They tested it last week one day and found twenty-seven feet of soft muck and under that was soft clay and quicksand. It is hard to tell when it will quit sinking.

Clarence Jinnings and John Weldy were at Fort Wayne last Thursday. Mr. Weldy bought a corn husker of the International Harvester Co. while there.

J. P. Walter came home from Warsaw last Sunday and stayed over Tuesday to vote.

Myron Long started for Nebraska last Tuesday to look after his interests there.

ALL WRONG

The Mistake is Made by Many Butler Citizens

Don't mistake the cause of backache. To be cured you must know the cause.

It is wrong to imagine relief is cure. Backache is kidney ache.

You must cure the kidneys.

A Butler resident tells you how.

Mrs. Charlotte Steele, Pearl Street, Butler, Ind., says: "I suffered from rheumatic pains in my back and sides and I was subject to dull headaches. I had but little strength or ambition and was generally run down when my attention was called to Doan's Kidney Pills. Procuring a supply at Stone's drug store, I commenced using them and in a short time they cured me." (Statement given April 10, 1906.)

On December 19, 1908, Mrs. Steele confirmed the above and added: "I have no hesitation in again endorsing Doan's Kidney Pills. The cure this remedy made in my case has been permanent and at the present time I am free from every symptom of kidney complaint."

For sale by all dealers. Price 50 cents. Foster-Milburn Co., Buffalo, New York, sole agents for the United States.

THERE are many cheap frauds in paint as in most things; adulterations in materials, short-measure gallons, paint thinned with water or benzine; a lot of ways to cheat in paint.

We know them all by competing with that kind of paints. Devoe Lead-and-Zinc Paint is pure carbonate of lead, pure oxide of zinc, pure linseed oil and color and turpentine dryer.

Every Devoe dealer can show you official state chemists' reports to prove it. Devoe Lead-and-Zinc is good, pure, full measure.

Scott's Emulsion

is the original—has been the standard for thirty-five years.

There are thousands of so-called "just as good" Emulsions, but they are not—they are simply imitations which are never as good as the original. They are like thin milk—SCOTT'S is thick like a heavy cream.

If you want it thin, do it yourself—with water—but dont buy it thin.

Eat What

You want of the food you need Kodol will digest it.

You need a sufficient amount of good wholesome food and more than this you need to fully digest it.

Else you can't gain strength, nor can you strengthen your stomach if it is weak.

You must eat in order to live and maintain strength.

You must not diet, because the body requires that you eat a sufficient amount of food regularly.

But this food must be digested, and it must be digested thoroughly.

When the stomach can't do it, you must take something that will help the stomach.

The proper way to do is to eat what you want, and let Kodol digest the food.

Nothing else can do this. When the stomach is weak it needs help; you must help it by giving it rest, and Kodol will do that.

Our Guarantee

Go to your druggist today, and purchase a dollar bottle, and if you can honestly say, that you did not receive any benefits from it, after using the entire bottle, the druggist will refund your money to you without question or delay.

We will pay the druggist the price of the bottle purchased by you.

This offer applies to the large bottle only and to but one in a family.

We could not afford to make such an offer, unless we positively knew what Kodol will do for you.

It would bankrupt us.

The dollar bottle contains 2½ times as much as the fifty cent bottle.

Kodol is made at the laboratories of E. C. DeWitt & Co., Chicago.

"I Don't Care About Wool, I Want Style"

That's what a young fellow said in our store the other day. In less than a minute he had changed his mind.

For we told him what you probably know already—that, unless a suit is all pure wool, it will not wear well and it simply cannot be made to hold and keep its style.

Clothcraft All-Wool Clothes

Then we tried one of these smart, dashing Clothcraft suits on him and showed him the Signed Guarantee that it was all pure wool. He bought the suit.

These are the most remarkable clothes we've ever seen—they have so much style, they are honestly all wool and yet they sell at the same prices as common clothes—$10 to $25.

Clothcraft is the ONLY Guaranteed pure wool line in America, at these prices.

Most of the men in town have found out about these clothes and they are selling fast. Don't let a good thing like this get away from you.

Exciting Debate

The Methodist Brotherhood held a public debate at the church last Monday night. The question was: Resolved, that Cook's claims regarding the discovery of the North Pole are stronger than those of Peary. The affirmative side was championed by Dr Albertson, Thomas Rudd and E. B. Dunten, and the negative by Profs Austin and Endicot and Dr. Shumaker

The speeches were all able and well delivered. While Dr. Albertson was making the closing address quite a spirited contest arose between the negative and the affirmative regarding the acceptance of certain evidence. It required great tact and skill on the part of President Bean to decide some of the finer points. In doing so he proved himself a master of assemblies. The judges were L. C. Harding, Clyde Blaker and L. H. Higley. After a long and deliberate consultation they decided in favor of the affirmative.

The best of brotherly sentiment prevailed, although the keen and witty retorts reminded the spectation of old time college and political debates. The audience was large and all enjoyed the meeting. Special praise is due the Brotherhood for furnishing such an entertainment.

Quite a number of the members of the association want another debate on the same question. If this is consummated active men will be selected as the speakers.

DISGUSTING, UNWARRANTED ATTACKS BY THE COURIER

Butler's Good Name Wallowed in the Mire By the Yellow Journal Scribe

For several issues the Auburn Courier had the appearance of a dime novel at the expense of Butler and to the shame of the publisher. We understand your situation, Mr. Lochner. It is not for the good of Butler that you are making such fervent appeals and using your employer's space to show up the "gang." Oh, no! you have an ax to grind. There is nothing for you to lose, except perhaps your reputation as an editor—if you ever had a reputation.

We do not believe that you were even informed or misinformed as to the facts in the little incident referred to. You saw a chance to use your hammer and chisel, and people who think for themselves and care for the good name of their town will agree with us.

The gang which you so vividly depict as outlaws is not half as bad as you make out. While the boys have been persistent in joking Mr. Ware and should be compelled to desist from further annoyance, yet there are two sides to the question. But why should the Courier take such an active part in the matter when the law will take its course and mete out justice to both sides. The articles printed in the Courier concerning the "gang" is not only a disgrace to the city of Butler, but also to the newspaper fraternity.

It would be much more to the credit of Lochner and his superiors to take care of the criminals which are turned out at Auburn and leave Butler alone. We understand that there are several "wife beaters" in Auburn, but we did not hear of it through the Courier. Besides if Lochner takes care of the bank failures in the southwestern part of DeKalb county he will have his hands full. In all fairness we ask Mr. Lochner to confine himself to facts. Just such "rot" as the Courier has been printing is what makes outlaws and criminals.

When it comes to actual damage done by the "gang" five dollars will more than pay for all the property disturbed in Butler on Hallowe'en night, outside of the shooting which was done by Mr. Ware. However, the threats and actions of some of the boys after the shooting is not condusive to good citizenship, and should not be countenanced.

Tomorrow's Pleasure

There are two kinds of pleasure in life, the one diminishes as we get farther and farther from it, the other increases as the days grow into years and the years grow near to a century. No man who heard John B. Gough lecture, saw Edwin Booth act Hamlet, Joe Jefferson play Rip Van Winkle, or heard Beecher preach would ever think of blotting from his mind the pleasant memories that linger there. How often have we heard some one remark, "I wouldn't have missed that for a hundred dollars" or "I wish I could blot that out of my mind."

In Beeches's days there were multitudes who lived almost under the shadow of Plymouth church who did not care to hear a man talk. Today there are hundreds who sneer at the modern Lyceum lecturer, but fifty years hence, hundreds, yes, thousands will cherish the memory of the pleasant evening spent listening to the fascinating story, laughing at the ancient joke as the lecturer burned his message upon their soul. Hear Charles Howard Plattenburg at the opera house Nov. 16.

CUPID'S PRANKS RECORDED HERE

Former Butler Young Lady Weds Chicago Man.

The HERALD wishes to acknowledge receipt of the following announcement: "Mr. and Mrs. C. P. Urie have given in marriage their daughter, Wilma, to Mr. Henry C. Harris on Wednesday the tenth of November, nineteen hundred and nine, Sturgis, Mich. At home after the fifteenth of December, 4146 Clarendon Avenue, Chicago, Ill." The many Butler friends of the Urie family will join the HERALD in congratulations. May happiness abound in this new home.

A number of Prof. Ewan's scholars got it into their heads that their instructor was married, and proceeded to give him a rousing belling last Friday evening. Mr. Ewan tried to explain to them that it was a false report, but they wouldn't have it that way, and "belled" louder than ever. —Edon Commercial.

KENDALLVILLE, IND., Nov. 5—W. H. Loyd and Adeline Baldwin of Rome City were married yesterday in this city by Justice E. P. Lash at the home of Mr. and Mrs. W. A. Isbell on North Oak street. The couple are well along in years and this is their third venture on the matrimonial stage.

Ralph M. Hutchison, of Columbia City, and Audia May White, of Ligonier, have announced their engagement, and the wedding will be solemnized the latter part of this month. Mr. Hutchisonn is city editor of the Columbia City Commercial-Mail, and Miss White is the daughter of Rev. C. E. White, pastor of the Methodist Episcopal church of Ligonier. They will reside in Columbia City.

The approaching marriage of Mr. William Kenline and Miss Lydia Bluhm, both formerly of this city, is announced. Mr. Kenline is now living in Fort Wayne and the bride to be and her sister recently sold their millinery store and returned to their former home at Kendallville.—Garrett Clipper.

Word has just been received here that Harry L. Gandy, former editor and publisher of the LaGrange Democrat and Kendallville News and former district chairman of the democratic party for the Twelfth Indiana district, has been united in marriage at his home at Rapid City, S. D., to Miss Frances Keister, now a resident of that city, but a former Whitley county, Indiana girl, who was Gandy's stenographer when he was district chairman here.

The news of the wedding came as a surprise to Gandy's friends here, as many of them were not aware that he had been divorced from his former wife. It now develops that the divorce was granted some time after the Gandys had moved to South Dakota. The couple had two children.

Mr. Gandy's bride is the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. James Keiser, of Churubusco, who removed to South Dakota some time ago. She had been employed as a stenographer at Rapid City.

Mr. Gandy served as district chairman three years ago when Clarence Gilhams was elected to congress over his democratic opponent, Dr. Moor. After this stinging defeat Gandy sold his newspaper interests here and went west. It was while he was serving as district chairman that Miss Keiser served as his stenographer.

SOUTH WHITLEY, Ind., Nov. 5.—The sensation of the day in this city is the marriage of Prof. O. H. Bowman, former school superintendent of the town schools, to Miss Belle Combs, of South Whitley. Prof. Bowman lost his wife a couple of years ago after leaving the school business to go on a farm near Pierceton for his health.

SCHOOL NOTES

Pithy Paragraphs From Our Public Schools

SENIOR NOTES

Prof. Sherley of Wabash college gave a very interesting talk to the members of the high school Tuesday morning. His subject was "Success."

The grade cards were handed back Tuesday after a "good long while." We suggest that they arrange to proceed to get them out sooner next time.

The fire drill was practiced Tuesday afternoon for the first time this year. Mr. Bean says that unless we improve a great many will be injured when the "for-sure-fire" breaks out.

We hear (?) that Edward has some new shoes.

A report is also going around that when you're in the assembly room you're supposed to study. How queer!

"Miss A." Grace!! Suppose you attend to your own work for about ten minutes.

Yes? It almost makes me "laff."

The program last Friday morning was given by Society No. 2. It consisted of two numbers—a reading by Helen Garber and a piano solo by Francis Harcourt.

JUNIOR NOTES

Mr. A. finally got time to give us our grade cards.

Some of the pupils made out their outside reading reports in a forty minute period. I guess that is going some.

Tennis is gradually dying out as the weather gets colder.

We practiced the fire drill today for the first time this year, and Oh! such a mix-up. The two door openers failed to do their duty at the sound of the gong, thus two others were appointed.

Harmon Parker was absent Monday morning.

Miss A. says "the assembly room is the place for study only." We wonder why they have recitations in it.

It has been reported that several of our prominent B. H. S. boys belong to the famous order of the "Black Hand."

Mr. Beems seems to be quite a favorite in third year Latin class.

"Giggle" Apt has at last found his place. (On the front seat.)

SOPHOMORE NOTES

We have just finished book one in geometry. It has proved very interesting to some.

Wanted by Zura—Some oil to take the squeak out of my shoes.

LaNora Dunten was absent Monday.

The commercial class has such (good) grades that it isn't necessary for Mr. Bean to put them down.

Don't smile! Don't whisper! Just look at somebodys feet.

Don't forget the debate Friday night.

A little Freshman—"I like botany trips, but Oh! you moonlight walks."

"Grace! Can't you keep still five minutes?"

Do you suppose we will have a program next Friday morning? It is Society No. 1.

FRESHMEN NOTES

D. A. Baker was absent Monday forenoon.

There is a certain Freshie who doesn't know the meaning of the word "gormandize." Evidently he never went to grandmother's for Thanksgiving dinner.

Jennie Cain was absent Monday forenoon.

(Mr. B.) "This morning at noon I was obliged, etc." Really, we never knew before that noon was a part of the morning.

Popular Fancy of a Junior Editor—"I love my studies, but Oh, you now and then."

Wanted by those most concerned—An odor eradicator.

Talk about generosity! Why C. P. let's the other girls chew her gum.

Oh, the wise and mighty Seniors,
They think they own the school,
But we notice that they still bow down
Before Miss A.'s stern rule.

OUR FRESHMEN CLASS

We are twenty jolly Freshies
The pride of the B. H. S.
The teachers are all fond of us,
As they will soon confess,
If you will only ask them
They'll tell you one by one
What good deportment grades we have
When other grades have none,
And how our lessons, day by day,
Are well and quickly done.

Our Latin class is a wonder
And Algebra's our long suit
We all are fond of Botany
And think the teachers' cute.
Our English, say it's dandy,
It really can't be beat
If you'd hear us recite some day
You'd say 'twas quite a treat
If our explanations are mixed up
So the points will never meet.

Picture Wallace in Latin class
Murdering Latin and making us laugh
Picture D. A. when he's quiet awhile
Picture Audra without a smile
Picture Carrie pronouncing a word
It's the funniest sound you ever heard
Picture Edwin trying to walk with a girl
His feet get mixed up and his head's in a whirl
He's a picture no artist can paint.
Picture Blanche trying to study alone
Picture Loren answering the phone
Picture Francis without a beau
And Shirley with one, don't you know.
Picture Ruth H. reading a note
Imagine it's the one that Lester wrote
Picture sweet Bess when she looks demur
Picture L. T. when he looks at her
Picture Vera when she's not looking sober,
Why, she has not smiled more than once since October,

They are pictures no artist can paint.
Picture Dessie—she's bit her pencil so
The poor thing's heart broke long ago.
Picture Miss A. with her little book
Giving Cora a mark and a tragic look.
Picture Gail, under the teacher's eye,
Then picture her when he isn't by.
Picture Jennie—her Latin's fine
She knows the right answer every time.
Picture Evelyn's cheeks turn gray
When Mr. A. steps down that way.
Picture Mabel on a stretch, bound for home
After all the class have read this poem
These are pictures no artist can paint.

Why I Left the Woman's Club

In these days of suffragist furore, the story of a former club woman, told in Woman's Home Companion for November, is particularly interesting:

This woman has taken a prominent part in club work. The following story of a club election shows why she resigned in disgust.

"Never so long as I live will I forget that election day! Precinct workers and ward heelers may employ less refined methods, but certainly not less effective. The opposition lost. Delegate after delegate cast a vote opposed to her sense of right and wrong, yes, and her own wishes, because she lacked the courage of her convictions, because she was afraid of a woman who said 'I will rule at any cost.'

"The closing of the polls was marked by scenes that would have been funny, if, to the earnest club woman, they had not been so pathetic. As one of the tellers I had full benefit of all that happened. I saw hysterical women weep on the neck of our defeated candidate who had herself well in hand. I heard members accuse each other of treachery—and worse. I saw husbands come and take their disheveled and tearful wives home in cabs. And I heard the successful candidate say with teeth almost locked:

"'I'll teach the women of —— to interfere with my plans!'

"No successful political leader of a graft-cursed municipality ever settled election accounts more systematically than did Mrs. Smith. Every plum went to her supporters. No member of the opposition received the slightest recognition. The party whip snapped on the air at each announcement of a new appointment."

Push The Button-and Rest

THE "Royal" Chair, roomy and graceful of design. is the convenient Morris chair. There it no rod to let slip out and let the bacK fall. You don't have to get up out of the chair to adjust the back. A finger's pressure on the little button just under the right arm of the chair, moves the back down or up as far as you want it. And it stays where placed until the button is pushed again. Costs no more than the old fashioned kind, Lose cushions or upholstered. With or without footrest.

NOVEMBER

L1134

DeKalb County Herald

BUTLER, INDIANA.

A. S. POWERS, - - - Publisher.

Your credit may be good, but your money is better.

Nobody has as yet made a success of predicting the end of the world.

If a man knows all about you and is still your friend, he'll do to tie to.

When the south pole is discovered let somebody stay there and sit on it.

When a woman acquires a job lot of trinkets she begins to speak of her jewels.

The auto runs over you and you die. The aeroplane runs over you and you don't mind it a bit.

The proof that there is no coal trust is found when the temporarily embarrassed one tries to get a ton on tick.

The snag boats of the future will be employed to yank the dark and menacing clouds out of the aerial highways.

On her last trip over the Lusitania consumed $16,000 worth of coal. How would you like to be the Lusitania's coal man?

"What is a kiss?" asks the New Orleans States. If the editor of that paper doesn't know by this time he never will learn.

Perhaps neither Peary nor Cook would have discovered the north pole if they'd known there was going to be such a fuss about it.

Mars is only 35,000,000 miles distant from the earth now. It is a fact, however, that there are a good many wide, open leads between the two planets.

The idea that there is always room at the top may be all right, nevertheless it is fortunate that Cook and Peary didn't reach the north pole at the same time.

During "aviation week" at Rheims an aeroplanist was fined twenty francs for reckless flying. He did not run into any one, nor did he smash into anything; he merely frightened the spectators.

Dr. Murphy says the man who discovers how to kill the cancer germ will be a greater man than the discoverer of the north pole. We might make a similar claim for the man who shall discover a hair restorer that will restore.

Yes, fellow citizens, your Uncle Sam sits on the North Pole, rests one foot on the Far East, the other on the Far West, and with his horny hands digs a ditch across the middle of the hemisphere, while his sons capture all the prizes of the air and earth. (Deafening applause.)

A law has recently gone into effect in New Jersey which compels all vehicles—not only automobiles, as is the custom everywhere, but all teams using the public highways at night—to carry two lights, one in front and one in the rear. Such a law, faithfully enforced, is a cheap and practical method of safeguarding highway traffic, not only from collisions, but also from the numerous accidents which result from bad places in roads and bridges.

Continued efforts are making by the National Association for the Study and Prevention of Tuberculosis to discourage the practice of sending indigent consumptives from the East to the West and the Southwest. It has lately reported that more than seven thousand persons, hopelessly diseased, go from the East every year, only to die in one of the five States favored by consumptives. Tuberculosis can be cured or arrested in any part of the country, and the percentage of cures in the East is nearly as great as in the West.

The most cursory survey of the world's literature, dramatic or otherwise, will convince anyone that the profession of humorist or true comedian is one of the most exacting ever known. The jokesmith may get a momentary laugh from an audience that is willing to take the will for the deed. But the man who would set his name among those who have made permanent additions to the world's fun must have a list of specifications for a permit to make a road through a Pinchot reserve. He must have insight, sympathy, knowledge of character. He must have a sense for fact that is felt beneath his airiest webs of fancy. He must have an ear for the right word that no correspondence school can confer. It is easier to be a wit than to be a humorist; easier to laugh at people than to laugh with them, or make them laugh at themselves.

The rush of thousands of eager individuals to the Indian land openings in Montana shows to what an extent land hunger is besetting the people. It is a question if one out of a thousand among those that have registered in the hope of securing Indian reservation land has any intention of settling and honestly "farming it," even if he is lucky. The land hunger has become an obsession, fed by the lottery method the government sees fit to utilize in distributing those lands. It is the old story of "taking a chance," and the individual pays railroad fare and living expenses, which amount to no inconsiderable sum, in the hope of being one of the lucky ones in Uncle Sam's lottery. If a plot of ground is drawn, no doubt it will be scorned as something undesirable—for even the most productive western land is not enticing in its sagebrush form. It means hard work to bring a productive farm out of raw western land, and most of those who take part in such speculative rushes are not of the sort to carry the game through to its finish and to make actual ranchers of themselves.

Recently there died a man of wealth and prominence whose business was conducted in accordance with a policy of enlightened self-interest—that active endeavor toward personal advancement which takes into account in large measure the general good. He was a manufacturer of bicycles, and realizing that improved highways meant increased demand for the products of his factories, he became a pioneer in the movement for good roads. Realizing also that a more general appreciation of the many pleasures and benefits of outdoor life would mean more bicycle-riding, he established a magazine devoted to such life. The two causes which he helped along in energetic and practical fashion need no defense. Both are generaly accepted as important factors in the material advancement of the country and in the personal welfare of its people. When the bicycle declined in popularity this man engaged in the manufacture of automobiles, and continued his advocacy of good roads. That he prospered by his far-sightedness vindicated the wisdom of his course, even from the selfish point of view. Every man is justified in promoting his own welfare, in protecting his own interests and in acquiring a competence against the inevitable old age. It is his duty to do this, and happy the man, and happy the community in which he lives and labors, when he does it in such a way that those round him are benefited rather than injured. Not all can be great manufacturers and gain wealth by leadership in national movements, but every person can act on the sound theory that self-interest is best served, not by the narrow selfishness which sees only the present day and the immediate surroundings, but by the far-sightedness which includes the days to come, and the comprehensive planning which involves the common welfare and progress.

THE END OF THE FEUD.

The idea of mercy is not associated to any great degree with the American Indian. Yet he is not now—and never was—uniformly implacable and hard-hearted. In a book on "The Columbia River," W. D. Lyman recounts an incident, which if not typical, is at least worth repeating for its intrinsic worth. Between the Shuswaps and the Okanogans there was a deadly and long-continued enmity. This was ended in a curious and interesting manner.

The Shuswaps had captured the only daughter of the Okanogan chief. She was led with other captives into the Shuswap camp. The boasting warriors were gloating over the poor victim, and the squaws were discussing the greatest possible indignities and tortures for her, when an aged white-haired chief got the attention of the tribe.

He declared that his heart had been opened, and that he now saw that torture and death ought to end. He proposed that instead of shame and torture they should confer honor on the chieftain's child.

He said, "I can hear the old chief and his squaw weeping all the night for their lost daughter."

He then proposed that they adorn the captive with flowers, put her in a procession, with all the chiefs loaded with presents, and restore her to her father.

The girl, meanwhile, who did not understand a word of the language, was awaiting torture or death. What was her astonishment to find herself decorated with honor and sent with the gift-laden chiefs toward her father's camp.

On the next day the mourning chief of the Okanogans and his wife, looking from their desolate lodge, saw a large procession approaching, and they said, "They are coming to demand a ransom."

As the procession drew nearer, one of the men said that it looked like a woman adorned with flowers in the midst of men with presents of robes and necklaces.

Then they cried out, "It is our child, and she is restored to us!"

They met the procession with rejoicing and heard the speech of the old Shuswap chief. And after that there was peace between the Shuswaps and the Okanogans.

"Speed" Means to Acquire Success.

When we use the slang "too slow" as applied to non-success we are speaking correctly, according to etymology, for "slow" conveys an idea opposite to that of "speed," and for more than 10,000 years the root from which "speed" has grown has preserved its influence in a dozen languages and has continually signified the idea of quickness in grasping, in drawing to, in extending, in making room for action, in bringing prosperity and success by reaching out.

Our Aryan ancestors used the little word "spa," and from it has grown among scores of other words, our word "speed," which, through the centuries, has not been restricted to its meaning of velocity. It conceived the thought of velocity that reached out for success. It meant having room for action, to increase in the direction of prosperity. Without "spa" there was no "success."

Appropriate.

"What did Marie, the telephone operator, say when she broke her engagement with Harry Phlunz?"

"Not much. She just dropped him a note with an inclosure and wrote, 'Ring off.'"—New York Globe.

Americans have a habit of worrying a man into his grave and then telling what a good man he was.

If a woman works a good deal, other women who do not work so hard say she works too much.

When it is said of a man that he is bull headed, it means that he is foolish.

Smiles of The Day

Worldly Analysis.

"Do you think I ought to consider wealth in selecting a husband?" said the confiding girl.

"It depends," answered Miss Cayenne, "on whether you are looking forward to a happy home or to a divorce that will pay dividends."

An Indication of Leisure.

"Do you think a four-leaf clover is a sign of luck?"

"Yep," answered Farmer Corntossel. "There ain't no doubt in my mind but what anybody with time to fool away lookin' for four-leaf clovers is purty lucky."

Very Rude.

"Since we're living in the country, I take long walks for my complexion, dear."

"Yes. That's the worst of living in the country—the chemist's shop is always such a long walk."—Sydney Bulletin.

The Mighty Pen.

"I would lay down my life for you," wrote the poet to the ideal of his wildly beating heart, to which she replied:

"I won't ask you to do that; if you will but lay down your pen I shall be satisfied."—Houston Post.

The Beneficiary.

Little Clarence—No, I honestly don't believe it does me a bit of good when you thrash me.

Mr. Callipers—I begin to suspect as much, my son, but you have no idea how much good it sometimes does me to thrash you.—Puck.

New Church Near the Vatican.

Notwithstanding the fact that there are already 366 church edifices in Rome, a committee was received the other day by the Pope in special audience, to find ways and means for the construction of another sumptuous church not far from the Vatican palace. The new church will have three steeples and the cost of construction will be several millions of dollars, contributions toward which are expected to come from Catholics all over the world. The region adjoining the Vatican palace is without a church in the direction of the Prati di Castello, and the construction of the new church will signalize the pontificate of the present Pope.

The Ship Subsidy Scheme.

Mr. Taft's measure of friendship for the working, wealth-creating body of the American people was pretty well established by his indorsement of the Aldrich-Boutell tariff iniquity.

A few days ago he furnished still more evidence of his attitude toward the money kings by promising to tax the plain people $10,000,000 to replant forests laid waste by greedy lumber barons in haste to garner vast unearned profits through their tariff privilege. He made his proposition clear beyond doubt by announcing that he would urge Congress to provide a ship subsidy of at least $8,000,000 a year for the upbuilding of an American merchant marine.

The American people pay a special tax to enable the steel trust to destroy our once great shipbuilding industry by charging the American shipbuilder more for raw material than his British competitor pays for the same material from the same mills. Mr. Taft coolly demands that the American taxpayer furnish another special tax of $8,000,000 a year to restore the shipbuilding industry.

Why not equalize matters at the expense of the steel trust by the very simple process of reducing the tariff on their products to a point where American shipbuilders can save that $8,000,000 a year by low costs?

Mr. Taft's fair promises before election and his unfair performances since March 4 are in unfortunate contrast. His vast consideration for the workers of the nation during the campaign seems to have dwindled most amazingly. Every single one of his statements of policy since inauguration has embodied a proposal to increase the burden of the middle classes.

Citizen Taft and President Taft appear as diversely disposed as the celebrated Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde. Which, as we have before mentioned in these columns, is a mystery that has manifested itself in connection with many men as soon as they were installed in the White House.—Chicago Journal.

A Costly Trade War.

The threat by Canada that if the maximum rates of the Payne tariff are applied to products of that country it will enforce against imports from the United States its maximum, which increases by one-third the ordinary Canadian tariff rates, is only one step in the ruinous tariff war which the paper tax in the Payne law has caused.

Pretending to reduce the tariff on print paper the authors of that outrageous law have actually increased it, to the great injury of our neighbor, which has important wood pulp and paper industries. The tariff on news print paper in the Dingley law was $6 a ton. The Payne law reduces it nominally to $3.75 a ton, but there is a provision in the law that the actual tariff shall be rates specified plus 25 per cent, which maximum can be remitted in favor of any country only by order of the President. This maximum goes into effect on April 1 of next year.

Because the Province of Quebec has a stumpage tax of 25 cents on wood cut from the public lands for export, while the Province of Ontario prohibits the exportation of wood cut from her public lands, the Treasury Department in August issued a circular imposing a retaliatory duty of $2 a ton on paper from these provinces. The total import charge on paper from these sources will accordingly be $6.69 when the maximum is applied against Canada, as it surely will be.

In retaliation for this circular Quebec threatens to join Ontario in prohibiting the exportation of wood cut from her public lands. Irritated and angered by the discriminations made against her in Washington, Canada threatens to stop all importations from the United States. The sum total of these importations is $167,000,000, while we buy from the Canadians over $75,000,000 worth a year.

Here, then, in a trade amounting to nearly $250,000,000 a year which is harassed and threatened with extinction. It includes, by the way, exports of American farm products to the value of nearly $25,000,000 a year.—St. Louis Republic.

Wages and the Tariff.

The false pretense that the monopoly tariff in this country is maintained in order that the American workingman may be better paid than the "pauper" laborer of Europe is discredited by the fact that in free-trade England wages are higher and cost of living lower than in any other country of Europe.

It is not by accident that in free-trade England wages are some 20 per cent higher and cost of living about the same percentage less than in high-protection Germany. The difference is due to economic causes, chief of which is the tariff in the two countries.

The protected American manufacturer pays his operatives no more than the labor market compels him to pay. And in proportion as the money wage in this country is higher than in Europe the tariff increases the cost of everything that the American workingman must buy. The tariff with one hand takes from the American workingman everything it gives him with the other.

People to Own Railroads.

In view of increasing investments in American railroads it is gratifying to be assured that the additional securities will be absorbed at home.

For many years railroad promoters were compelled to seek European assistance to finance their operations. As a result millions in earnings have gone across the ocean to pay dividends on stocks and bonds held by foreign investors.

More recently American money has gone into these securities in constantly increasing volume. Now when a railroad needs additional capital it is not compelled to seek it in London or Amsterdam or Berlin. Home demand for investments justifies American bankers in furnishing the money. Instead of sending the bonds abroad the banks borrow the money in Europe if necessary, and the bonds are kept at home.

This condition is encouraging for more than one reason. When railroad policies no longer are molded in deference to ideas of foreign stockholders, many problems connected with their management should be easier of solution.

Still more significant is the ultimate drift of the securities into the hands of smaller investors. With thousands of Americans directly interested in the prosperity of the roads, a form of public ownership will have been achieved that is far more likely to produce salutary results than the chimerical dream of taking over these properties by the government.

Mr. Taft—and Mr. Roosevelt.

Theodore Roosevelt was the first man to apply the principles of the circus ring to the Presidency of the United States. His seven years in the White House were one continuous wild west show. Like Buffalo Bill, his noise and smoke attracted great attention, keeping the audience intent on the show—besides covering up any little flaw that might detract from the general effect.

Mr. Roosevelt's broncho-busting style gave him a personal popularity which enabled him to permit American forests to be destroyed by lumber barons greedy for the unearned extra premium given them by a ridiculous protective tariff and then calmly propose to spend $15,000,000 of the people's money planting trees.

Mr. Taft should not deceive himself in this matter. He should consider carefully whether he is as popular as Mr. Roosevelt, whether his personality will enable him to play fast-and-loose with Western people and Western resources.

The tariff puts a premium on the destruction of American forests. The removal of the tariff would have opened Canada's unlimited timber tracts to American consumers at reasonable prices, and would also have removed the incentive for lumber kings to hasten forest destruction.

Mr. Taft permits the tariff to destroy our forests, and in the same breath proposes a $10,000,000 bond issue to tax the American people to plant new forests.

Does he believe himself as popular with the West as Mr. Roosevelt? Or is he merely making a fat mistake?—Chicago Journal.

Tariff and Panics.

President Taft has a good deal to say in his present speech-making tour of the bounding prosperity of the west.

Rightly so. Not only do government records show stupendous advances in western agricultural wealth, but Mr. Taft, being observant, can see plenty of evidences at first hand. He would be obtuse indeed if he failed to note signs of confident prosperity all through the west.

There was a time when Republican spell-binders attributed increasing prosperity to high tariff. But not now. Records of national tariff history are all against them.

For instance, the 1907 panic came along when Americans were enjoying the highest tariff ever known up to that time. This was quite a setback for the Republican orators who had been preaching that panics always resulted from low tariffs.

A recent economic writer points out that, in general terms, all the commercial panics since the war period have resulted from high tariff rather than low tariff. This was certainly so in 1873 and also in 1893—the latter coming during the operation of the McKinley tariff, about a year and a half before the Wilson law took effect.

The panic argument, as a buttress for high tariff, has done its full duty and has gone into the discard. We even find supporters of the Aldrich-Taft bill admitting that the nation can be prosperous from natural causes, and that the tariff only helps.

The west's prosperity is in spite of high tariff, such as the Aldrich-Taft bill levies.

Sectionalism.

Before President Taft left the smug precincts of New England on the eve of his Western trip he deprecated all talk of sectionalism.

The President condemned particularly the statement by a prominent Western governor that the West is organizing against the East on tariff lines. Mr. Taft opined—and his New England audience applauded—that there should be no sectional lines drawn and that the West should be as happy over the new tariff law as a child with a new toy.

Platitudes on unity, fraternity and loyalty are easy of expression. To paraphrase an ancient quotation, "They cry peace, peace, when there is no peace."

If the Eastern mill bosses discern signs of organization in the West against their tariff domination they have only their own fatuity to blame for it. The real breeders of sectionalism are the men who whipped Congress into the passage of the Aldrich-Taft bill to line their private purses.

If a wave of political discontent is sweeping over the West and middle West, portending a Democratic Congress next year, its momentum is directly traceable to the Eastern mill bosses who applaud President Taft's warnings against sectionalism.

And it is noticeable that the farther the President goes on his Western tour these signs apparently impress themselves more and more upon his reluctant mind.

Civil War Stories

The Moorefield Raid.

[All lovers of war—all who look upon such contests as our nation passed through from 1861 to 1865 as a halcyon period, only productive of immense estates, shoulder-straps and personal honor and glory, are desired to read the subjoined narrative, written by an eyewitness:]

About 9 o'clock one night in October, 1864, not long after the battle of Cedar Creek, we were startled by the bugle at headquarters calling "boots and saddles!" In twenty minutes from the sounding of the call we were in our saddles and leaving camp in a southeasterly direction, without the least idea of where we were going or what we were going to do. When I say we, I mean the rank and file; of course the officers knew.

About a mile from camp we halted, and after a short delay were joined by the balance of our brigade—the Eighth New York and Twelfth Pennsylvania Cavalry.

All night we rode steadily forward, not stopping until about an hour after daylight, when we halted long enough to give our horses a little corn and boil coffee for ourselves; then into the saddle and forward again. By this time we had learned that our destination was Moorefield, in the Luray valley, and our errand the surprise of Rosser's cavalry camp at that place. About noon we came to Brock's Gap, where we were to cross the Shenandoah mountains. Soon after reaching the summit of the pass our scouts encountered half a dozen bushwhackers, one of whom escaped, thus destroying nearly all hope of our being able to surprise their camp; but we pushed on the faster until about 3 o'clock in the afternoon, when we came in sight of Moorefield, but only clouds of smoke showed where the rebel camp had been. Not daring to delay to remove their stores, they had set fire to them and taken to the mountains. We drew up on a level plain a short distance from the town, and were informed that we should remain a day or two to rest our horses after our forced march. When a regiment is halted in the enemy's country the first thought of the boys is of something good to eat; something for a change from salt pork and hardtack.

It was no wonder, therefore, when a drove of hogs came strolling and grunting past that our boys were seized with a strong desire to make their more intimate acquaintance. As we were not allowed to use our ammunition for such purposes, we tried a little saber exercise on our visitors. Now, imagine twenty-five or thirty men in hot pursuit of a hog, every man doing his best to cripple the unfortunate animal by a blow from his saber—the hogs grunting, squealing, tacking and turning—they were just in good running order, those of the men not engaged in the pursuit cheering on those who were—and you have the scene. Sometimes a hog would make a short turn and dart between the legs of his would-be captor, causing him to perform evolutions not laid down in any tactics. I remember that one of the boys in my company caught a hog by the hind leg, under the impression that he could hold him; but after being dragged full length through the mud for several rods at the rate of forty miles an hour, concluded that he didn't care for fresh pork in that way.

The owner of the hogs was an old lady of the extreme secession type, living just in the edge of the town, and the next morning she came to our Colonel, boiling over with wrath against the "nasty Yankees who would rob a poor woman of her last hog," and demanding pay for said hogs in terms more forcible than elegant. Colonel Reed, of course, expressed his deep sympathy for her loss. "But, my dear madam," said he, "it couldn't have been my boys; they wouldn't do such a thing. It must have been those thievish Pennsylvanians over there; you just go over and state your case to their Colonel." In about twenty minutes she came back again, madder than before. She had been to the Colonel of the Pennsylvania regiment, and he was positive that it couldn't have been his men, and had sent her to the Colonel of the Eighth New York, and he had flatly denied that his men would steal hogs, and had told her to come back to the Twenty-second New York and make them pay for that pork. "And it's no use higglin' round, some of you-uns has got to pay me twenty dollars for them hogs." Colonel Reed finally sent her to the commissary, and I believe she got a receipt for the hogs, with a promise to pay when peace was declared.

On the morning of the second day after our arrival at Moorefield we started on our return march. We had failed in one object of our raid, but General Merritt was bound to make it pay yet. At starting, a rear guard of 100 men was detailed, who were instructed to drive along anything and everything in the shape of stock, cattle, sheep, hogs, horses, mules, etc. I may as well say here that the hog part of the business was not all fun, on account of the well-known disposition of that animal which renders him exceedingly averse to being driven. But with cattle and sheep we had little trouble. Sometimes it would be the flocks and herds of some wealthy farmer; sometimes the only cow and cosset sheep of some poor family; but it made no difference; there was neither partiality nor pity shown. Rich or poor, secesh or pretended Unionist—there were very few real Unionists in that section—they all fared alike.

Twice while on duty in that rear guard I saw women weeping and pleading with the soldiers to spare their one cow; saw them put their arms around the creature's neck and try to prevent her from being driven to join the rapidly-increasing drove, and heard the hard-hearted officer in command order the men to either drive along that cow or shoot her where she stood. Once I saw a little blue-eyed girl, 6 or 7 years old, following her pet lamb as it was carried struggling out of the yard, and heard her pitifully crying, "Oh, please, Mr. Soldier, please don't carry off my Nannie!" That lamb didn't go.

On our arrival at Winchester Uncle Sam was the richer by over 3,000 sheep, 1,000 hogs, 500 or 600 horses and mules and about 500 head of cattle. Thus ended the great Moorefield cattle drive.

Thomas Sanders at Shiloh.

I heard firing with the first dawn of the morning, as I was going to the spring for water. I thought it merely a pickets' exchange of compliments, but it fast grew into a roar of musketry, and then the cannon put in their thunder, and the very earth began to shake. We saw at once that that was business. It was awful music—awful.

When I got back from the spring I found my regiment forming, without orders. Soon an aid came, with orders for us to form. "Already formed, tell your General." Soon came back the same aid with orders for us to advance toward the peach orchard, which we did, promptly, beginning to meet stragglers, both wounded and not wounded; some minus clothes or gun.

One, a 16-year-old Wisconsin boy, came back crying, saying: "My regiment has run, and now they will write home about it, and he should be taunted with, 'Oh, you can't fight!'"

He asked if he might fight with us, and he did, and nobly, until late in the afternoon I lost sight of him. If that boy is alive I should like to know it.

Across the peach orchard, across the cotton field into the timber, into the hollow went we. It was thick there. If men ever fought—if men ever won honor, glory, fame, and renown by fighting, by really working hard at fighting—those men were Prentiss' brigade. Covered with sweat, blackened and grimed with powder, they looked like hero-harvesters, and they were.

The enemy had possession of the ridge; they opened upon us; we paid them back in our best. We could not use our artillery from the hollow.

Ordered back to the peach orchard. Here we lay flat behind a fence for two hours, with their artillery working at us. Ours was exchanging compliments now.

A large shell struck and exploded in our rear and made a great hole. Morris Fitzgibbons jumped into the hole, remarking, "Shells never strike twice in a place——" But almost that instant another lit so close as to cover him and fill his eyes and mouth with sand. With scarcely a pause in his speech he added, "But they do, for they did that time."

And now in our front appears a regiment, marching in perfect order as if on holiday parade—the New Orleans Guards—a crack regiment. "Await orders," came along the line. When they were within ten rods we gave our fire. We had Harper's Ferry muskets—loaded with ball and three buckshot. Fearful was the havoc we made—a line of dead men stretched across that field. Their colonel was pierced by sixteen balls. They paid us back later that afternoon.

The fight of that afternoon is indescribable—our part of it. The air was blue with powder, the singing bullets, the screaming shells, the rebel yells—it was indescribable. Might as well try to describe a terrific storm. We did not yell, but all that long afternoon we worked our guns like men a-haying, and we did not cease until away into the night.

Our work the next day was not heavy. Fresh troops had their chance. Such are my recollections of Shiloh.

Chestnuts and Poker.

In September, 1864, the Third Battery was holding the situation at Fort Hell (in history called Fort Sedgwick). The name was fully merited, for if there was ever a hell made by mortar and artillery shelling and sharp-shooting it was at that place. It was an irregular and in strength an insignificant piece of work. There was no rest for the boys day or night. The only safe place was under the gun carriages, close to the logs and earth. Then in the angles a sharpshooter often got in his work. The Third had been there some days, and with their usual nervous and combative desire had fired right and left, bursting shells with such accuracy on the top of rifle-pits and redoubts that the Johnnies kept close and let us alone. Some of the boys liked a little "poker," and often indulged in the game among themselves, but let a stranger enter and it seemed as if they all wanted him for their meat, and went for him for all they and he was worth. One day an Illinoisan came in to "Hell." Soon the boys had him in for poker. As they played, some rebel got the range, and his bullet hit the board upon which the cards had been laid and scattered them. It was surprising to hear what an extra-fine hand each had, and how they cursed the reb for robbing them of a big winning. Everything was redealt, the "antes" were made, a pat, etc. All was ready to discard and draw, when zip, another bullet struck the "pile," and scattered things badly. The Illinoisan rose to his feet, asked for a gun, telling the boys to "hold on, I reckon that fellow is in a tree." He crawled like a snake into the woods, and soon called out, "Say, look at that big chestnut over there; watch it!" We did so, and soon a puff of smoke came out of the leaves, and the "zip" of a bullet passed us. We heard the Illinois man sing out, "Watch!" Then came the crack of his rifle; a second later, out from the chestnut, like a spread-eagle, came the reb, and he laid where he fell, as did three of his companions who thought to get him away. The Illinoisan came back, his face lit up with satisfaction. We resumed our poker-playing, and in half an hour he had cleaned us out of our money as easily as he had cleaned out the chestnut tree. As he left he laughingly said, "That's the way we do in Illinois, boys. When the war's over come over to American Bottoms, near St. Louis, and see me. I'm one of Bergdan's men."

Dream Book of Modern Science.

Modern science is writing a dream book of its own to take the place of the unauthorized and mischievous manual in vogue among the superstitious. When completed it will be a remarkable production, wonderfully interesting and thoroughly practical and helpful, so states H. Addington Bruce in an interesting article in Success Magazine.

Science, of course, does not assert that all dreams are significant. A good many dreams—and especially the commoner dreams of falling, flying, and the various forms of nightmare—merely testify to some trifling disturbance of the physical organism of the dreamer. This has long been recognized, and the text books are full of anecdotes showing how dreams may be made to order, so to speak.

One experimenter, by tickling a sleeper's nose, caused him to dream that tar was being plastered over his face and then violently pulled off, causing agonizing pain; uncovering his knees gave him a dream of traveling in a stage coach in the dead of winter and suffering frightfully from the cold; putting a hot water bottle to his feet made him dream that he was walking over the lava of an active volcano.

But while appreciating the inconsequential character of dreams induced by such means, as also by indulgence in late suppers, the cramping of a muscle through lying too long in one position, or the slipping off of the bedclothes, science insists that there are times when even the most trivial of dreams may be profoundly portentous.

The doctor rattled on with an unceasing flow of talk, while the mind of the Quaker plunged into a serious of violent efforts to adjust itself to this new situation. He tried to force himself to be glad that he had been mistaken. He for the first time fully admitted the significance of the qualms which he felt at permitting himself to regard this strolling gypsy with such feelings as had been in his heart.

"But now," he said to himself, "I can go forward with less compunction. I can gratify my desire for excitement and adventure with perfect safety. I will stay with them for a while, and when I am tired can leave them without any entanglements." When the situation had been regarded for a little while from this point of view, he felt happier and more care-free than for weeks. He solaced his disappointment with the reflection that he should still be near Pepeeta, but no longer in any danger.

At this profound reflection of the young moth hovering about the flame, let the satirist dip his pen in acid, and the pessimist in gall! There is enough folly and stupidity in the operations of the human mind to provoke the one to contempt and the other to despair.

CHAPTER IX.

The spring and summer had passed, autumn had attained the fullness of its golden beauty, and the inevitable had happened! David and Pepeeta had passed swiftly though not unresistingly through all the intervening stages between a chance acquaintance and an impassioned love.

Any other husband than the quack would have foreseen this catastrophe; but there is one thing blinder than love, and that is egotism such as his. His colossal vanity had not even suspected that a woman who possessed him for her husband could for a single instant bestow a thought of interest on any other man.

David had abandoned the Quaker idiom for the speech of ordinary men, and discarded his former habiliments for the most conventional and stylish clothes. Contact with the world had sharpened his native wit, and given him a freedom among men and women that was fast descending into abandon. Success had stimulated his self-confidence and made him prize those gifts by which he had once aroused the devotion of adoring worshipers in the Quaker meeting house; he soon found that they could be used to victimize the crowds which gathered around the flare of the torch in the public square.

A transformation had been taking place in Pepeeta. Under the sunshine of David's love, and the dew of those spiritual conceptions which had fallen upon her thirsty spirit, the seeds of a beautiful nature, implanted at her birth, germinated and developed with astonishing rapidity. Walking steadily in such light as fell upon her pathway and ever looking for more, her spiritual vision became clearer and clearer every day; and while this affection for God purified her soul, her love for David expanded and transformed her heart. Her unbounded admiration for him blinded her to that process of deterioration in his character which even the quack perceived. To her partial eye a halo still surrounded the head of the young apostate. But while these two new affections wrought this sudden transformation in the gypsy and filled her with a new and exquisite happiness, the circumstances of her life were such that this illumination could not but be attended with pain, for it brought ever new revelations of those ethical inconsistencies in which she discovered herself to be deeply if not hopelessly involved.

David had chosen an old plan to compel Pepeeta to abandon her husband. For its execution he had already made a partial preparation in an engagement to meet the justice of the peace who had performed her marriage ceremony. The engagement was conditioned upon his failure to persuade the gypsy to accompany him of her own free will.

Immediately after supper he took her to the place appointed for the meeting. This vivil officer had been a companion of the quack's for many years. His natural capacity, which was of the highest order, had secured him one place of honor after another; but he had lost them through the practice of many vices, and had at last sunk to that depth of degradation in which he was willing to barter his honor for almost any price.

The place at which he had agreed to meet David was a log saloon in one of the most disreputable parts of the city, and to this spot the infatuated youth made his way. Now that he was alone with his thoughts, he could not contemplate his purpose without a feeling of dread, and yet he did not pause nor seriously consider its abandonment. His movements, as he elbowed his way among the outcasts who infested this degraded region, were those of a man totally oblivious to his surroundings.

Having reached the door of the saloon, David cast a glance about him, as if ashamed of being observed, and entered. It was a fitting place to hatch an evil deed. The floor was covered with filthy sawdust; the air was rank with the fumes of sour beer and adulterated whisky; the lamps were not yet lighted, and his eyes blinked as he entered the dirty dusk of the interior. The door which he pushed open admitted him to a parlor scarcely less dirty and disgusting than the saloon itself, at the opposite end of which he beheld the object of his search.

"Well, I see you are here," he said, drawing a chair to the table.

"And waiting," a deep and rich but melancholy voice replied.

"Can't we have a couple of candles? These shadows seem to crawl up my legs and take me by the throat. I feel as if some one were blindfolding and gagging me," said David, looking uneasily about.

The judge ordered the candles, and while they were waiting observed: "You had better accustom yourself to shadows, young man, for you will find plenty of them on the road you are traveling. They deepen with the passing years, along every pathway; but the one which you are about to set your feet leads into the hopeless dark."

"What I want is help."

"And so you have appealed to me? You wish me to go to this woman and tell her that her marriage was a fraud?"

"I do."

"Young man, have you no compunctions about this business?" said the judge, leaning forward and looking earnestly into the blue eyes.

"Compunctions?" said David, in a dry echo of the question. "Oh! some. But for every compunction I have a thousand desperate determinations."

"I will help you. There is no use trying to save you. You are only another moth! You want the fire, and you will have it! You will burn your wings off as millions have done before you and as millions will do after you. What then? Wings are made to be burned! I burned mine. Probably if I had another pair I would burn them also. It is as useless to moralize to a lover as to a tiger. I am a fool to waste my breath on you. Let us get down to business. You say that she loves you, and that she will be glad to learn that she is free?"

"I do! her heart is on our side. She will believe you, easily!"

"Yes, she will believe me easily! She will believe me too easily! For six thousand years desire has been a synonym for credulity. All men believe what they want to, except myself. I believe everything that I do not want to, and nothing that I do! But no matter. How much am I to get for this job?"

They haggled a while over the price, struck a bargain and shook hands—the same symbol being used among men to seal a compact of love or hate, virtue or vice.

"Be at the Spencer House at 11 o'clock," said David, rising. "You will find us on the balcony. The doctor is to spend the night in a revel with the captain of the Mary Ann, and we shall be uninterrupted. Be an actor. Be a great actor, Judge. You are to deal with a soul which possesses unusual powers of penetration."

"Do not fear! She will be no match for me, for she is innocent—and when was virtue ever a match for vice? She is predestined to her doom! Farewell! Fare-ill, I mean," he muttered under his breath, as David passed from the room.

Having regained his calmness by a long walk, David hurried back and reached the open space along the river front where peddlers, mountebanks and street venders plied their crafts, just in time to meet the doctor as he drove up with his horses.

CHAPTER X.

After the doctor had vanished that evening, David and Pepeeta passed down the long corridor and out upon the balcony of the old Spencer House, to the place appointed for the interview of the judge. The night was bright; a refreshing breeze was blowing up from the river and the frequent intermissions in the gusts of wind that swept over the sleeping city gave the impression that Nature was holding her breath to listen to the tales of love that were being told on city balconies and in country lanes. Under the mysterious influence of the full moon, and of the silence, for the noises of the city had died away, their imaginations were aroused, their emotions quickened, their sensibilities stirred. It seemed impossible that life could be seriously real. Their conceptions of duty and responsibility were sublimated into vague and misty dreams, and the enjoyment of the moment's fleeting pleasures seemed the only reality and end of life.

"Pepeeta, you have long promised to tell me all you knew of your early life; will you do it now?" asked David.

"Of what possible interest can it be to you?" she answered.

"It seems to me," he replied, "that I could linger forever over the slightest detail. It is not enough to know what you are. I wish to know how you came to be what you are."

"You must reconcile yourself to ignorance; the origin of my evistence is lost in night. It is too sad! I do not want to think of anything that happened before I met you. My life began from that moment. Before, I had only dreamed."

They ceased to speak, and sat silently gazing into each other's faces, the heart of the woman rent with a conflict between desire and duty, and that of the man by a tempest of evil passions. At that moment, a slow and heavy step was heard in the hallway. They looked toward the door, and in the shadows saw a man who contemplated them silently for a moment and then advanced. David rose to meet him.

"I beg your pardon," he said, feigning embarrassment, "I had an errand with the lady, and hoped I should find her alone."

"You may speak, for the gentleman is the friend of my husband and myself," Pepeeta said.

"I will begin, then," he responded, "by asking if you recognize me?" And at that he stepped out into the moonlight.

Pepeeta gave him a searching glance and exclaimed in surprise, "You are the judge who married me."

He let his head fall upon his breast with well-assumed humility, remained a moment in silence, looked up mournfully and said, "I would that I had really married you, for then I should not have been bearing this load of guilt that has been crushing me for months."

At these words, Pepeeta sprang from her seat and stood before him with her hands clasped upon her breast.

"Be quick! go on!" she cried, when she had waited in vain for him to proceed.

"Prepare yourself for a revelation of treachery and dishonor. I can conceal my crime no longer. If I hold my peace the very stones in the street will cry out against me."

"Make haste!" Pepeeta exclaimed, imperatively.

"Madam," continued the strange man. "You are not married to your husband. I deceived you as I was bribed to do. I was not a justice. I had no right to perform that ceremony. It was a solemn farce."

These words, spoken slowly, solemnly, and with a simulation of candor which would have deceived her even if she had not desired to believe them, produced the most profound impression upon the mind of Pepeeta. She approached the judge and cried: "Sir, I beg you not to trifle with me! Is what you have told me true?"

"Alas, too true."

"Oh! sir," she cried, "you cannot understand; but this is the happiest moment of my life!"

"Madam?" he exclaimed, interrogatively and with consummate art.

"It is not necessary for you to know why," she answered; "but I thank you."

"What can it mean? I implore you to tell me," he said.

"Do not ask me!" she replied. "I cannot tell you now! My heart is too full!"

"But does this mean that I have nothing to regret and that you have forgiven me?"

"It does. I bless you from the bottom of my heart!"

She gave him her hand. He took it in his own and held it, looking first at her and then at David with an expression of such surprise as to deceive his accomplice scarcely less than his victim. Young, inexperienced, innocent in this sin at least, she stood between them—helpless.

It is one thing for a woman deliberately to renounce her marriage voks, but quite another for a heart so loyal to duty, to be be betrayed into crime by an ingenuity worthy of demons.

Child if misfortune that she was, victi mof a series of untoward and fatal circumstances, she had reason all her life to regret her credulity; but never to reproach herself for wrong intentions. Her heart often betrayed her, but her soul was never corrupted. She ought to have been more careful—alas, yes, she ought—but she she meant no sin.

TINY SIR ROBERT HART.

T. P. O'Connor Gives His Impressions of First Meeting with Him.

In the course of an article in T. P.'s Weekly T. P. O'Connor gives a striking account of the impression Sir Robert Hart made on him at their first meeting: Was this the man, then I said to myself, as I gazed across a long table at him—it was at a luncheon given in the House of Commons to Mr. Balfour—was this the man who had played a part so gigantic in the history of one of the greatest, most ancient, and most powerful of empires—the empire that has within its borders 400,000,000 of people? Was he the obscure poor Irish lad who, leaving his grim Ulster home—a home of puritan Wesleyans—had risen step by step until he was one of the chief rulers and one of the most audacious and successful revolutionaries that the most ancient and the most conservative of civilizations has ever seen in its thousands of years of history? Could a spirit so lofty, so daring—I had almost said so terrible—dwell within that tiny frame? And even the tininess of the frame does not exhaust the things in the physical appearance of the man that suggest that insignificance to which the biographer of Sir Robert Hart bears testimony.

The hands are tiny, the feet are tiny, the chest is tiny. The expression of the face, again, is as far as could be from that impressiveness which one would associate with a spirit so daring, so masterful and so extraordinarily potent. For it is the expression of a detachment, of a meekness, of a certain intense reflectiveness and self-absorption that would suggest the mediæval saint, intent only on the agonies of a soul trying to be saved, rather than a mighty man of action; the type of Thomas a Kempis rather than of Cortes or Pizarro, or Cromwell, or Danton. If Sir Robert Hart were not taken for a Christian and a European saint, he might well pass for a priest in that great school of thought and resignation which was founded by Buddha, or perhaps he might even pass for one of those clerkly souls who in China begin their great political careers by mastering all the lore of all the Chinese sages, and had in the quietude of his student's cell learned to look to his own inner thoughts rather than to the glare and tumult of the outside world.

The very way the man holds his hands confirms this idea of the gentle student rather that of the man of action. They are held together between his legs as though he had never known what it was to raise them, not merely to hold a sword, but even to handle any but the lightest feather pen. The voice, again, is just like the appearance; very soft, almost inaudibly so, very slow, very gentle. If it were not for the large dark eyes, which, in spite of their sharing the gentleness of expression of the rest of the figure and face, are brilliant and stand out and haunt you—if it were not for these wonderful eyes you might well sit opposite Sir Robert Hart for many hours and yet be unconscious that you were in the presence of one of the greatest men of your time. These eyes, too, suggest to you something different; they could not belong to a commonplace man. And to me they made an especial appeal; they are just like the eyes of one of the most brilliant men I have known—T. Sexton, the well known parliamentarian of the '90s. And Sir Robert Hart is like Mr. Sexton grown old.

A Sidewalk Conversation.

"How's your garden coming on?"

"Why do you ask that question?" demanded the suburbanite suspiciously.

"Just out of politeness."

"Glad to hear that. I thought maybe I had promised you some vegetables."

Had One of Her Own.

Rector—I did not see you at our social gathering last week, 'Lisbeth. Why was that?

'Lisbeth—Well, I had a little gathering o' my own last week, sir.

Rector—Dear me! Where was that?

'Lisbeth—On the back of me neck, sir.—Ally Sloper's Half-Holiday.

A DEPARTMENT for WOMEN

Who Pays Mother's Wages?

Father complains of high prices and hard work. The boys protest that their weekly pay isn't enough to contribute anything to the support of home. The girl who works finds her salary too small to buy ribbons and theater tickets she considers essential to her small existence. But good old mother never says a word.

Father and the boys and the girls do all the complaining. Mother does the real hustling for the entire family. Before father is out of bed in the morning mother is busy getting his breakfast. Then she routs out the boys and starts them off to work. After she serves breakfast to the girl who doesn't have to be at her post until 9 o'clock she has time for a hasty bit herself.

Making the beds, sweeping, dusting, washing, ironing, sewing, marketing and cooking keep mother pretty busy most of the daytime. After her family enjoy the evening meal it is mother who clears the table and washes the dishes. Then, while father spends the evening with his cronies at the district political headquarters the boys spend their dimes at some roller rink or cheap dance and the girls occupy gallery seats at the neighboring theater, mother darns stockings for an hour or so to rest herself.

Yet mother is the only one of the family who doesn't draw a regular salary, and, if she is like a good many mothers, she hardly ever knows the pleasure of spending a dollar on herself. If father and the boys and girls had to hire a housekeeper they would be obliged to pay her. Why not be fair and pay mother a little something every week for her own use? Who pays mother's wages in your family?—Chicago Journal.

The Old-Fashioned Bonnet.

How dear to my heart is the old-fashioned bonnet,
The old-fashioned bonnet Nell used to wear;
Without any plums and red cherries stuck on it—
The bonnet that didn't require phony hair,
The dishpan effect may be stylish and stunning,
The waste-paper basket that's lately come in
May be quite the rage and recherche and cunning,
But give me the hat she tied under her chin.

A Jelly for Invalids.

Has it ever occurred to you to jelly fruits in the smallest possible glasses for the invalid friend? Glasses may be had which will hold but a quarter of the jelly usually put into the ordinary tumbler size.

While you may not want to carry to your friend just one of these tiny playthings, the variety that you could take in four of the little glasses would be novel and so much more acceptable to the delicate appetite than a quantity of one kind.

Novel Women's League.

A pin money league has been organized by business women in New Jersey. Its purpose is to promote the earning of money at home and to put on sale at an exchange articles there made. This organization is open to mere man. The men are not expected to contribute pound cake or novel designs in pincushions or art embroideries, but the man with a hobby, he who likes to "carpenter" or "tinker," may submit his products and possibly market them. The generous intent is clear. It is to persuade the man that he should never be ashamed of his work bench and tool chest; that in his hours of ease it is not hard for him to please somebody besides himself, and that, in short, he is almost as useful as a woman.

The Huzzar Turban.

In contrast to last year's low, conical crowns, the high affairs of this year seem almost startling. Paris is particularly enthusiastic just now over these jaunty huzzar turbans with high, draped crowns rising from brims set closely around the head. The apparent height is also increased by a stiff brush or aigrette standing straight up at one side. This huzzar turban has a velvet crown set on a narrow silk covered brim. Both brim and crown are of bluish violet and the violet aigrette rises from a cabuchon of the new au clair du lune trimming.

Health and Beauty Hints.

Witch hazel and rose water, half and half, is good for wind-tortured complexions.

Washing the scalp occasionally with lemon juice will make white hair glossy and of a pure color.

Stewed rhubarb has a well known medicinal value, besides being a complexion beautifier. It is said to be valuable for rheumatic troubles.

Bolting the food has ruined many a good complexion. Teeth were given for a purpose and if one does not use them they will suffer along with digestion and skin.

A good rule to acquire a graceful way of sitting is to be careful that the hips are never farther forward than the shoulders. To keep erect sit so the end of the spine touches the back of the chair.

Fads and Fancies in Dress

None of the new winter coats shows any flare at the hips.

Colored embroidery enters into much of the new neckwear.

As a rule taffeta will be the petticoat of the new season.

Hips are slightly more emphasized.

A pearly gray glove is lovely with costumes in the gray shades.

Filmy ties are worn with jacket suits, and jabots of a sheer order are also in vogue.

Oxidized long chains and small purses of the same material are worn with tailored frocks.

Laces of the most elaborate description are used for evening gowns, and in some cases the pattern is outlined with silver or gold thread or tiny seed pearls.

Castor shoes of leather and sail cloth are suitable to wear with dresses of the same color.

Roman gold pieces for brooches, hatpins, belt buckles and the like are set with very large stones.

There is a new white wash suede that has taken the place of silk and lisle gloves with fashionable women.

Silk-covered cord is a special trimming that makes a gown look individual, and is thicker than what is known as rat-tail.

Rosettes of all kinds, from the tiny ones for slippers to large fluffy affairs worn as a sash, figure among novel dress accessories.

Dainty lace slippers are made to wear with lace gowns to dinners. They are fitted with red heels and adorned with circular rosettes of lace.

A dash of color is given to many dresses by pinning a little tucked-up bit of chiffon at the front of the collar. Pale pink, white, green or delicate yellow is dainty.

Where Girls Propose.

All the courting is done by the ladies of Ukraine, Russia. When a girl falls in love with a man she goes to his house and tells him the state of her feelings. If her affections are reciprocated a marriage is arranged. If, however, Barkis is not willin' she remains in the house, hoping to coax him into regarding her suit with favor. The poor fellow can not treat her with discourtesy or turn her out, for her friends would be sure to avenge the insult. If he is really determined that he won't have her, his best plan is to leave his home and stay away as long as she remains in it. Thus a man may be turned out of house and home.

Woman's Love of Sensation.

All women seem alike in their love of a sensation. They must have some picturesque element in their lives; and if nature declines to supply it, they invoke the aid of art.

Numbers of men are quite content to plod on in the same rut. Day after day they can see the same people, go to the same places, do the same things without a grumble. No woman is like this. She yearns to be enthusiastic, to be deeply moved, to discover mysteries even when there are none. While a man falls in love because he can't help it, a woman very often begins to do so mainly out of inquisitiveness to know what it feels like.

Probably woman, with her greater eagerness and curiosity, supplies a wholesome stimulus to the less impressionable brain of man. She suggests, and he carries out the ideas which she would never have the patience to execute for herself, for his special virtues are perseverance and concentration, and an irritating habit of sticking to a thing impossible to the more superficial sex.

Fire Extinguisher.

A fire extinguisher, which may be easily made at home and kept in a bottle ready for use, consists of three pounds of salt and one and one-half pounds of salammoniac dissolved in a gallon of water.

Lest You Forget.

Remember the chills of winter,
When you longed for summer heat;
Remember the way you shivered;
Remember your frosted feet.

THREE NOBBY COSTUMES.

An Apron Overskirt.

Willow green permo fabric—a lustrous material woven with fine mohair and crinkled wool threads—was used for this dainty little frock, green taffeta silk in a slightly darker shade being introduced in the border effect which is so much used by French dressmakers just now. The feature of the frock is the odd little overskirt which slopes backward at the sides and is caught with a flat bow of green velvet at the back of the knees. A green velvet girdle encircles the waist and yoke and cuffs are of snow relande lace.

Chiffon Over Serge—A French Combination.

Chiffon tunics over wool frocks are said to be, in Paris, "very Cherult," and incidentally Cheruit herself is the designer of this autumn calling frock. Over a one-piece costume of fir green diagonal serge falls a straight tunic of black chiffon cloth, this tunic fastening in a diagonal line from right to left in the front. Cream lace is set into the neck above the yoke of fir green silk embroidered in self tone. The hat is a green velvet model with wings shading from green to pale yellow.

Youthful Pinafore Frock.

While the pinafore tunic is a bit hard to drape on any but an extremely slender figure, it is certainly charmingly youthful and graceful in style. Often the pinafore—as in the present instance—is made of a contrasting material. Over this little frock of dotted foulard the pinafore of plain colored satin makes a pretty contrast. The chic little bow at the top of the pinafore bib, on the bust, is of velvet in the shade of the plain satin. The big Gage hat of flexible beaver has a velvet bow catching the rolling brim back to the crown.

OTT, THE TAILOR

A Communication

MR. EDITOR:

Just at this time when there is much interest taken in the approaching local option election, I shall be glad to be permitted to say a few words about the relations of business and the liquor traffic. Though I am a minister I am a man of business, as I raise much money and direct the business affairs of a church which sometimes reach four or five thousand dollars a year. Besides this I handle cash aggregating sixty or sixty-five thousand dollars every year for my conference, and accounts of about forty thousand dollars more. Here are some facts:

MARTINSVILLE

Within the years 1898-1904, the number of saloons in Martinsville increased from six to fourteen. They averaged a $10,000 business which meant in 1904, annual receipts of $140,000. In the same period 34 other business houses failed. If the receipts of the liquor traffic had gone to the groceries, clothing stores, etc., of Martinsville legitimate business would have had its just income, its accounts would have been paid.

GARY

The magic city of Gary is the site of the U. S. Steel Corporation. The corporation bought 6,000 acres of land to build the plant and city upon. Not a lot can be purchased without a restrictive clause in the deed which prevents the sale of liquor on the premises. It is a simple business proposition. Men will give better service, will save their wages and will be satisfied with their employers without liquor.

WINSLOW

The largest dry goods store had an increase the first "dry" year of $4,000 business. A hardware dealer the same year increased his trade $2,500. The liveryman, a pro-saloon man, admitted that his business was "as good as ever." The bank cashier reported people having bank deposits who formerly did not have enough to eat.

SYRACUSE

After all saloons had been closed here 34 business firms reported. Not one claimed that trade had fallen off; some said "as good, some excellent, some better than ever before." At the same time more farmers were coming to town, people were buying better goods, and were paying for them in cash.

MONTICELLO

A local paper reports larger crowds in town, better trade, and concludes "No dear, the people of the county are not staying away from Monticello because they can't get booze here." Instances could be multiplied at Salem, Boswell, Bloomington, Oxford, Paoli and many other places.

CHURUBUSCO

The town board met for the sole purpose of cutting the tax levy from $1.25 to 25 cents. They had $5,000 cash on hand. The town is prosperous, considerable building, every business room but one or two filled, a $12,000 school building is going up, a contract for a new sewer has been let. The advocates of a wet town down there can't understand it.

KENDALLVILLE

"All the thirteen rooms formerly occupied by saloons now occupied." In their places are: 1. Second hand store. 2. Soda fountain. 3. Shoe store. 4. Job printer. 5. Restaurant. 6. Grocery. 7. Cigar store. 8. Bakery, etc.

THE FARMER

And now by this time, I am sure that some one asks how it will be with the farmer. Our business interests are largely a unit. What is good for one is good for another. The business man depends upon the farm, the mine, and the factory for his support. Where will the farmer sell his corn if the gin mill stops? The secretary of agricultural is James Wilson. He has had the confidence of men of all parties, and he certainly knows what he is talking about. When he was asked what part of the corn crop was used for the manufacture of liquor, he replied that it was about two per cent. The chief clerk of the internal revenue department says that much of even this is used for making alcohol for scientific or mechanical purposes. It seems to me that the farmer might fatten an extra porker with that extra two per cent of his corn, or in these days when eggs ought to be kept in a safe with the diamonds, he might raise a few more laying hens. A reliable correspondents of the Chicago Record-Herald maintains that if all the breweries and distilleries were closed, so far as their market for corn is concerned, the farmer would never find it out.

WHO GETS THE MONEY?

From a bushel of corn four gallons of whiskey are made. These retail for $16.40. I do not know just how much the adulterations cost. The government gets $4.40. The railroad company gets $1. The retailer of the whiskey gets $7.00. The farmer gets 60 cents. The drayman gets 15 cents. The consumer gets drunk. We have all seen too frequently what the wife and children of the consumer get from it. Any one can see that a business which makes a 60 cent product sell for $16.40 is fictitious in its character unless inconceivable labor is expended in the manufacture. The facts are as follows: The traffic pays us for grain $110,000,000; the labor bestowed amounts to $22,500,000. The total which the traffic pays for grain and labor is $132,500,000. But they sell us back their product, and we pay for it a sum like this, $1,188,000,000, or just about nine times as much! The dear people certainly do not get that eight-ninths of the enormous sum.

Respectfully,

W. B. FREELAND,

Pastor M. E. Church, Auburn.

LIK OLD FRIENDS

The Longer You Know Them the Better You Like Them

Doan's Kidney Pills never fail you.
Butler people know this.
Read this Butler case.
Read how Doan's stood the test.
For many years.
It's local testimony and can be investigated:

Mrs. C. R Abrams, N. Pearl Street, Butler, Ind., says: "I have nothing but words of praise for Doan's Kidney Pills as they have always given very satisfactory results in my case. For years I suffered from severe attacks of backache and pains in my kidneys, sometimes extending as far as my shoulders. The kidney secretions were very irregular in passage and caused me much annoyance. After I had tried several remedies without success, I procured Doan's Kidney Pills at Stone's drug store and they brought me relief. In July 1902, I gave a statement for publication endorsing this preparation and at the present time, I gladly confirm what I then said. I have used Doan's Kidney Pills several times during the past two years when a cold has brought on a return of backache and I have never failed to receive the desired relief."

For sale by all dealers. Price 50 cents. Foster-Milburn Co., Buffalo, New York, sole agents for the United States.

Remember the name—Doan's—and take no other. 45-2

When a man starts out to make a model town the place to begin is at home. Then if he succeeds in mastering those who are under his own roof, he might be justifiable in offering advice to outsiders, but until he has done so, it is better for him to remain quiet.

Kills To Stop The Fiend

The worst foe for 12 yearr of John Deye, of Gladwin, Mich., was a running ulcer. He paid doctors over $400 without benefit. Then Bucklen,s Arnica Salve killed the ulcer and cured him. Cures Fever-Sores, Boils, Felons, Eczema, Salt Rheum. Infallible for Piles, Burns, Scalds, Cuts, Corns. 25c at Stone's drug store. 44-1m

You may be surprised and feel a trifle hopeless, if you realize how many married men, who have large families are groping through Lonesome Land.

Smashes All Records

As an all-round laxative tonic and health builder no other pills can compare with Dr. King's New Life Pills. They tone and regulate stomach, liver and kidneys, purify the blood, strengthen the nerves; cure Constipation, Dyspepsia, Biliousness, Jaundice, Headache, Chills and Malaria. Try them. 25c at Stone,s drug store. 44-1m

Young people who insist on making foolish marriages should remember that the come-home-and-be-forgiven act doesn't occur as frequently in real life as it does in the summer novels. You often hear of boys who become angry and want to run away. Grown men have the same weakness; there never was a man, probably, who did not occasionally feel like running a way to a place where he would never be heard of by his acquaintances and friends.

The Twilight of Life

The muscles of the stomach in old age are not as strong or active as in youth and in consequence old people are very subject to constipation and indigestion. Many seldom have a bowel movement without artificial aid. Many, also, have unpleasant eructations of gas from the stomach after eating. All this can be avoided by the use of Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin, which permanently regulates the bowels so that passages come naturally, and so strengthens the stomach that food is digested without discomfort. It is absolutely guaranteed to do what is claimed, and if you want to try it before buying, send your address for a free sample bottle to Pepsin Syrup Co., 119 Caldwell Bldg., Monticello, Ill. It is sold by all druggists at 50c and $1 a bottle. 44 1m

There is a picture found on the walls of those who don't run to Madonnas of a man clasping a woman in his arms. She is attired in her bridal finery, and underneath is the name, "Alone at Last." Girls have always admired it and the women have bravely hidden their disappointment in looking at it in a tenderly reminiscent way. The picture is recalled by a snap shot taken of a young woman recently. She sat before a window from 7:30 one evening until 2 the next morning, listening to every footfall, and then when he came he was so mad because of her anxiety that he wouldn't speak to her. She was "Alone at Last" when she hung out of the window, but how different from the picture!

The Lady Maccabees entertained Friday evening for the benefit of the Butler public library. The "pink tea party," a play, was given by the "cullied ladies" and proved to be a successful affair. The idea was carried out in the refreshments which consisted of pink cake and pink and white ice cream with tea. The Misses Mabel and Grace Murch gave a vocal duet which was greatly applauded and enjoyed by all present. Miss Clara Jones gave an instrumental solo.

Steps are being taken by members of the Knights of Pythias Kendallville lodge 109, towards the building of a fine Pythian temple in that city. To this end plans were discussed at the regular meeting of the organization Tuesday evening and a board of trustees was appointed as follows: Herman Kruger, C. M. Case and J. C. Gillian. This board will investigate a suitable location for the home and will report to the lodge in two weeks when every member is urged to be present.

The football game between Butler's juveniles and Edgerton's second team played at this place Saturday was quite well attended and a good game was witnessed. The Edgerton boys outweighed the Butler boys by fifteen pounds per man. Nevertheless our locals were able to hold them at all times. The score was 6 to 12 in Edgerton's favor, but was made only through "flukes," they picking the ball up on fumbles and carrying it for long runs across the goal. Vincent Holtzberg, playing full back, was star actor for Butler, but was helped by having a stiff time and good support in the back field. The boys expect to play a return game soon.

Church of Christ Items

There will be a union temperance meeting at our place of worship on Sunday evening. M. O. Johnston, of Edgerton, Ohio, will deliver the address. Mr. Johnston has had much experience in the temperance movement being one of the moving spirits in the late campaign of Williams county, Ohio.

In the absence of the minister the services Lord's day will be in charge of M. O. Johnston.

The minister was greeted to a very pleasant surprise by about 70 members of the church who "took possession" last Thursday evening. A pleasant evening with refreshments was enjoyed by all.

The Y. P. S. C. E. held a rousing meeting last Sunday evening. About 50 were present. E. F. Albertson gave a practical address which can not but help to be conducive of much good. Mrs. A. Powers and Miss Muriel Baker gave centennial reports. Another such meeting is being arranged for Sunday evening. Everybody welcome.

S. B. BRADEN, Minister.

Class Social

On Monday evening class No. 14, taught by Dr. Albertson, met at the lovely home of Mr. and Mrs. O. T. Knisely for a class social.

At about 7:30 a number of ghostly figures were seen wending their way west on Broadway. By eight o'clock there were thirty spooks enjoying themselves in the parlors. It was a real spook party. Grotesque and frightful false faces added to the beauty (?) of the occasion. The ghosts were asked to try to identify each ghost. Mrs. Romain C. Campbell was given the prize, she having successfully guessed fourteen of the number.

After the unmasking another contest was entered into. Advertising pictures were placed on the wall, and each person was to guess the article advertised. Four persons "tied" on this test and the case was settled by costing lots. Miss Belle Norford was the successful competitor.

Luscious refreshments were served, after which some new plans for the class were discussed and steps taken for systematic and thorough methods of Sunday school work.

At a late hour the thirty-two guests departed, having greatly enjoyed the generous hospitality of Mr. and Mrs. Knisely.

Miss Leta Geddes was a Fort Wayne visitor Wednesday.

Charles Howard Plattenburg, lecturer, opera house, Nov. 16.

D. A. Hinds left the first of the week for northern Michigan for a deer hunt.

Cleo Casebeer of Fort Wayne visited Sunday with R. P. Troyer and wife.

The Dorcas society of the Lutheran church will meet next Wednesday afternoon with Mrs. Frank Stump.

Judiah Alexander of Coldwater, Mich., came Monday for a visit with his cousin, E. W. Bryant and other relatives.

Gene Wagoner and wife, who have been traveling through the west, are visiting with his parents, Chas. Wagoner and wife.

ADVERTISED LETTERS—Miss Josie Barrows, Mr. Lester Felkey, Geo. Fraley, E. V. Summerlott.

THOS. RUDD, Postmaster.

Mrs. Belle Rose of Kansas, and Mrs. Mrs. Mary Sperrier of Grant, Mich., are the guests of their sister, M.s. Chas. Adams.

The Butler High School football team will clash with the Edon High School team on the football field west of the electric light plant Saturday, Nov. 13. Game called at 2:30.

William Chambers stepped through a trap door in the private office of the Knisely Bros. & Co. bank last Saturday and bruised his hip quite badly. Dr. Shumaker is caring for him, and it is thought he will soon be around again.

Serious Symptoms

Mrs. Annie Hamilton, Stetsonville, Wis., developed serious symptoms, as a result of some form of female trouble from which she suffered.

A letter in which she describes these symptoms and tells how, by the Cardui System of Home Treatment, she finally managed to cure herself, may prove of value to you, if you are suffering, as she did, from ailments peculiar to woman.

She says: "When I was suffering from female trouble, I could not sleep, eat, or stand on my feet without pain I could not work, and could not stoop on account of pain in my side. I took medicine from three doctors without benefit, and the last one said I was in a critical condition, and going down hill. At last I took Cardui and in two days time I was a different woman. Now I eat good, work good and feel better than I ever did in all my life. Cardui is a good medicine and if all poor sick ladies knew of it there would be less suffering."

Store Talk

For Your Sake

As well as ours we ask you to keep posted on the offerings of this store. The Dress Goods, Silks, Ladies' Suits, Coats, Furs, Shoes, Clothing and all other departments are very inviting in their display of all that is new and stylish in merchandise for winter. Qualities that are right, styles that are the latest, prices that will please.

Hosiery and Underwear

In all earnestness we say to you that now is a good time to lay in a supply of hosiery and underwear and underwear for your entire family. Such qualities and values as we offer now will not possible another season.

It has always been our aim to have this department a trade winner. Merchandise that fits, wears and is reasonable in price is the great difficulty in this class of goods.

Whether it's hosiery or underwear, you are uncomfortable if you are not perfectly fitted; and you are dissatisfied unless you get good value for your money.

We have studied both these problems in connection with this department and we feel that we have the best fitting and the best wearing lines to be had in the country. Whether it is for yourself or your children we know we can please you.

Notions and Novelties

Whether it's a smallest item to be found in a Dry Goods Store, say a paper of pins, or the most elegant or elaborate novelty in the nature of a belt, bags, veil or some jewelry ornament, we want you to feel that you will find it right here. We have always paid much attention to our notion section, feeling that it is as much our duty to render good service and please you in the sale of these small items as it is when the article you want may run well up into the dollars. Give us an opportunity to prove this—

Wellesley Oak 500 Years Old.

A wide-spreading oak which experts have declared must have been growing at the time of the discovery of America by Columbus, is a landmark on the estate of the late Arthur Hunnewell in Wellesley, Mass.

The magnificent tree measures 26 feet in circumference at the base. It is a noticeable landmark on account of its unusual size. It intersects the fence which separates the fertile fields of the Hunnewell estate from the highway, and thus arrests the attention of the passer-by.

The late Mr. Hunnewell took great pride in the ancient tree. It has withstood the ravages of pests for a great many years and is apparently in condition to live for a great many more decades. The late Mr. Hunnewell once had the tree examined by an expert from the Smithonian Institute, who declared that it was between 400 and 500 years old.

Eliot, the apostle to the Indians, frequently passed the towering oak while going to and from South Natick, where he preached to the Indians, the tree being beside what was the old trail.

A NURSE'S EXPERIENCE

Is a Good Guide for Any Person Who Does Not Understand Kidney Troubles.

A nurse has to know just what to do for common ailments, and those who suffer backache, languor and other common signs of kidney trouble, should heed the example of Mrs. Judson Ellis, 414 Francis St., Jackson, Mich., known for many years prior to her marriage as "Nurse Baker."

"My back ached a good deal and was lame and weak, so that I had difficulty in straightening up or turning in bed," said she. "Doan's Kidney Pills benefited me wonderfully, and since using them I have been able to do my own work again."

Teaching Oyama to Shoot.

"Twenty-five years ago I was an experienced rifle shot," writes Horace Fletcher in the World's Work, "and could hit a moving object every time. The 22-caliber rifle and machine-made cartridge, which came into general use in the '70s, made extensive rifle practice possible. I wrote and published at the time a pamphlet on how to shoot with a rifle. It happened that copies of the pamphlet reached Japan, where I passed some time soon after. Japan had just begun to make a military organization on the most modern lines and Marquis Oyama was minister of war. He invited me to visit him in his home at Tokyo and showed great interest in the method of learning to shoot at a moving object with a rifle. He had already seen the pamphlet.

"I had a number of American rifles and ample ammunition with me in Japan and Marquis Oyama and the then Colonel Murata (inventor of the Japanese military rifle) joined me several afternoons at target practice. They entered enthusiastically into the spirit, Oyama in particular showing the enthusiasm of a boy. I shall never forget his keen joy the first time he hit a moving object with a bullet. It was a teapot thrown in the air, I believe, and when it came down in the dust and pieces he capered about and screamed in his delight like an excited schoolboy."

A BANKER'S NERVE

Broken by Coffee and Restored by Postum.

A banker needs perfect control of the nerves and a clear, quick, accurate brain. A prominent banker of Chattanooga tells how he keeps himself in condition:

"Up to 17 years of age I was not allowed to drink coffee, but as soon as I got out into the world I began to use it and grew very fond of it. For some years I noticed no bad effects from its use, but in time it began to affect me unfavorably. My hands trembled, the muscles of my face twitched, my mental processes seemed slow and in other ways my system got out of order. These conditions grew so bad at last that I had to give up coffee altogether.

"My attention having been drawn to Postum, I began its use on leaving off the coffee, and it gives me pleasure to testify to its value. I find it a delicious beverage; like it just as well as I did coffee, and during the years that I have used Postum I have been free from the distressing symptoms that accompanied the use of coffee. The nervousness has entirely disappeared, and and I am as steady of hand as a boy of 25, though I am more than 92 years old. I owe all this to Postum." "There's a Reason." HOW AND WHY THE AEROPLANE FLIES

MANNER IN WHICH THE AIR SUPPORTS THE AEROPLANE, SHOWN DIAGRAMMATICALLY IN THREE STAGES—ON THE GROUND, LEAVING THE GROUND AND IN FLIGHT.

The difficulty of keeping on a straw hat when motoring or driving may help to illustrate the first principle of governing the aeroplane, says the London Sphere. Setting out on a calm day, it will be found that the current of air rushing against one's hat increases with the speed of the car, and further, it will be noted that the tendency of this horizontal current of air is to lift the hat upward off one's head. The rim of the hat is usually tilted at a slight angle, and it is in effect a kind of aeroplane. The greater the speed at which it is moved through the air the greater is the uplifting pressure of the air against it. This upward reaction of the air gives support to every flying machine. Experimenters first designed gliding machines of light weight and with large bearing surfaces, and to gain the necessary support from the air they leaped off hills or ran down inclines. When the proper speed was attained the machine rose in the air. Thus gliding was accomplished. Be it noted that for gliding machines man has departed from the bird type with flapping wings. The gliders and the glider aeroplanes have fixed planes.

But it was soon found that these glides could only be of short duration, for the forward speed of the machine rapidly declined, and thus the upward supporting pressure of the air diminished. In the same way, when the speed of the motor car declined there would be less difficulty in keeping one's straw hat on. It was obvious that there should be an artificial propelling force to keep up the velocity of the machine. This idea was tested with models by shooting them from catapults and other devices, and is still employed for toys and demonstration purposes. A bullet shot from a gun is also in effect a flying machine, the enormous velocity imparted to it enabling it to make a long flight through the air.

As continuous velocity was essential, it soon became evident, however, that the best way of maintaining the velocity of a flying body was to have this propulsive power provided on board of the vessel itself. Experiments made with the propellers mounted on motor cars showed that a good speed could be obtained from a vehicle running on the road by fitting it with aerial propellers. Acting on the air, the screws move the whole apparatus forward just as a ship's propellers drive it through water. Airship propellers could thus be tested for their efficiency by use on road vehicles, and the method well illustrates the suitability of the air as a medium in which to use propellers.

The last stage was to obtain the gliding machine, mount an engine on this, and set it, to drive one or more propellers. The action of the screw was to force the machine along the ground first, and then as speed increased and air resistance grew greater, the whole apparatus would be lifted bodily off the ground, provided the upward air pressure was able to overcome the downward pressure due to the weight of the apparatus. As long as a certain minimum speed is obtained and a certain minimum air pressure kept up the vessel will move in the air, always controlled by two main forces—the downward pull due to gravity and the upward thrust due to the reaction of the air against which the machine is forced. The balance and control of the machine in the air, the action of varying wind currents, etc., are other important factors, however, which govern the machine in the treacherous aerial sea.

The methods of control on the various machines show many differences, but the main functions are much the same. The essentials are:

1. Control of upward and downward steering.
2. Control of side steering.
3. Control of the engine.
4. Balancing.

Levers are generally employed, but in some cases wheels serve to govern the various organs, and pedals are used in a few instances also. In the biplanes the rudder or elevator for up and down steering is placed in front, whilst in the monoplanes it is usually in the rear. The rudders for steering from side to side are generally at the rear. In the Wright machine they are coupled up with the balancing device which warps the main planes. Machines of the Voisin type are not provided with balancing devices worked by the driver, as they have automatic stabilizers in the shape of a box tail and vertical side panels between the main planes. Most of the monoplanes have balancing devices under the driver's control.

Engine control very often merely consists of a device for cutting off the ignition and thus stopping the engine. This, in many cases, takes the form of a wire or loop near the aviator's hand, so that he can instantly stop the motor.

How Much Money Can a Woman Spend?

HOW much money can a woman spend? We dare anybody to give us a few millions of dollars and let us find out, writes Mme. Qui Vive in the Chicago Record-Herald. How much money is a woman likely to spend? All that she doesn't save, and saving isn't her particular specialty or profession. Is it important that she shall spend $40,000 a year on silky raiment, fine feathers, tootsie-coverings of gold and bronze, silk hosiery and sweet nothings of lace with ribbons run through? It may be important, but to most of us it's not true. Mrs. Howard Gould says that she requires $10,000 a month, or $120,000 a year, in order to live decently as befits a lady of fashion. The news of it rather dazed some who have dashed about in grand style and much fashion on $9 a week, and put money in the bank during the dashing.

If it were not for the women coin-flingers, what would become of this great country of ours, anyway? There would be no need of tariff discussions and the infant industries would die from lack of nourishment. How many male shoppers invade the big department stores? A few timid, mouselike creatures, who scurry to the neckwear department and out again or who venture into the maelstrom of skirts and parasols to purchase an occasional pair of purple sunset socks. If women didn't spend money the merchant would be a rare curiosity to be seen only in the dime museum.

The small items are the ones that count up the fastest and count for practically nothing. When a woman gets a hat mad on and flutters into a millinery-shop to go insane for an hour or two, there's no limit to the number of hats she may select. As long as she keeps from fainting she can continue to pick out, even though her hair net may fall by the wayside and her false puffs give up the ghost. At a fashionable milliner's establishment few hats are listed under $40. A single plume may cost $200. A woman can spend $1,000 for skypieces without great fatigue of mind or body. And if she has a fortune she frequently does it.

When it comes to jewelry, there is of course no end to the outpouring of gold. Diamonds and pearls, filigree and emeralds, rubies and turquoise all cost real money of large denomination.

For veils and hosiery, handkerchiefs and gloves a woman can spend a fortune every year. A pair of corsets of good make will cost $25 and no corset is considered fit to wear after a month or six weeks—that is, by the coin-distributor who loves to let the money fly away or fly by, as the case may be. Handkerchiefs must be edged with real lace, gloves must be of the finest quality and discarded instead of cleaned, hosiery must never be worn after a toe has peeked through or a heel has developed little windows. Undermuslins must be handmade, trimmed with real lace edge or done with finest hand embroidery. Negligee flutters and frills can be most expensive, and dressing robes and kimonos are no trifling matter.

Mrs. Howard Gould isn't the only woman of extravagant tastes. There are others, and we hear about them frequently. Miss Guilia Morosini, the New York girl of prominence, says that she cannot dress well on less than $200,000 a year. It was a common report that she spent half that amount for gowns for the horse show one year.

Mrs. Russell Sage is another money flinger. It is said that her husband earned $3,000 a day, and she has been giving money away at the rate of $5,000 a day, going him $2,000 better. In one year she donated $14,000,000 to charity. At the death of her husband Mrs. Sage was estimated to be worth $100,000,000. The Gould family controls $80,000,000. Mrs. Hetty Green's fortune ranges between $50,000,000 and $60,000,000.

Once again: How much money can a woman spend? The reply to the problem is: First show us the woman. There are Katherine Goulds and there are Hetty Greens, the spendthrifts and the misers. What would bring joy to Mrs. Gould would create misery in the thrifty soul of Het. The talent of one is to waste and the ability of the other is to save.

Few women can say how much money a woman can spend. The majority have never had a chance to find out. Perhaps it is just as well since the genuine supreme ecstacy of extravagance is to buy something you don't need when you cannot possibly afford it. Yes?

GUNNER BLOWN TO PIECES AT A CANNON'S MOUTH.

Standing in front of an old-fashioned brass cannon, ramming the wadding down, Paul Paulson, a member of the Escanaba division of the Michigan State naval reserves, was literally blown from the muzzle of the gun when the charge exploded prematurely. The reserves had been called out to attend a celebration given in honor of the organization of the Grangers in that section and were about to fire an honorary salute to Mayor Rose, of Milwaukee, the principal speaker of the day, when the accident occurred. Fully 10,000 people were in attendance when the tragedy occurred and at least 1,000 of them were eyewitnesses to the death of young Paulson. So interested did the farmers become in the work of loading the old-fashioned piece that they crowded in among the gun crew and hampered them in their work. Several times they were ordered back, but without avail. The work of inserting the fuse and priming powder brought many of them so close to the breech of the weapon that they crowded about the wheels and powder boxes. Paulson was at the muzzle ramming home the wadding when a criminally careless spectator flicked the ashes from his cigar. There was a tiny puff of flame and smoke as the priming powder blazed, a deafening explosion and the frightened hundreds saw the gunner fall beneath the cloud of dense white smoke.

KICK SAVES A FARMER'S LIFE.

J. M. Underwood, an Illinois farmer, no doubt owes his life to the presence of mind of A. T. Woodstock, a brakeman on the Chicago, Peoria & St. Louis Railroad. Riding upon the pilot of his engine, which was pulling a fast freight train, Brakeman Woodstock was horrified when he saw the body of a man lying across the rails directly in front of the train as it rounded the curve. Signaling the engineer, who slowed down the train with the emergency brakes, he extended himself forward on the pilot as far as possible, and with his foot shoved Underwood from the track. When the train was stopped Underwood was picked up at the foot of a steep embankment. Other than a painfully bruised shoulder from coming in contact with the brakeman's shoe, Underwood was uninjured. He had missed his train and started to walk home. Becoming tired, Underwood says he sat down on the track to rest, and that is the last he remembers until he came to at the bottom of the embankment.

SOME CHANGES DURING ONE HUNDRED YEARS

Domestic Duties Have Been Wonderfully Lightened in the Past Century.

SKILL OF OLD-TIME MATRONS.

Our Grandmothers Were Capable of Doing Everything, from Making Candles to Spinning Silk.

To-day the whirr of a thousand looms hum in a spot that once echoed to the treadle of one. The man who sheared his sheep, and his wife who carded and spun and wove the wool, are asleep on yonder hill. The carders have fallen into rust, the spinning wheel is silent. Another generation wears woolen garments woven into shape by knitting mills, and fine linens and silks that have come from power looms in mammoth factories. What if the thread is more brittle and the color less enduring than fingers in the past were wont to spin and dye? Fair and fine and frail are the lilies of to-day. The woman who wears them thrusts rosemary out of sight with her last season's gowns. She does not want the things that endure.

The woman who by the pressure of an electric button illuminates almost an entire house seldom recalls the method which her grandmother employed for furnishing light to her household by means of candles fashioned by her own hands. She, perhaps, was able to procure beef tallow and wax from the beehives stocked with bees more for the purpose of supplying comb than honey—then so largely used in place of sugar. But her mother, doubtless, depended upon the tallow shrub, bayberry bush and candleberry tree to furnish a meager quantity of waxy substance which she might boil to a stiff consistency and into which her row of candle wicks might be dipped.

The innumerable inventions to simplify work in the kitchen, and which to do practically everything except consume the food, are considered indispensable by the modern housewife, but would have been gazed upon with wondering awe by the housewife of a hundred years ago, who thought herself lucky indeed if she owned a Dutch oven in which to bake her cakes and bread, and a twisting string, clock jack or turnspit dog to keep her roast revolving before the fire.

Things Women Did 100 Years Ago.

A hundred years have wrought as many changes in other respects. The belle of to-day who numbers her toilet soaps and face powders and creams by the score can scarcely realize that her grandmother made a preparation of starch or eggshells and cologne as a face powder, and collected grease and manufactured lye of wood and ashes, with which to boil soft soap for household purposes, some of which was refined for personal usage. Nor do the families who respond to the call of soft chimes or an announcing butler at the dinner hour think upon the time when their ancestors were summoned by the sound of a drum, a horn, a gun, an iron triangle or a loudly blown conchshell.

In the long ago women had few spare hours for idleness, for reading or amusement. There were stockings to knit, undergarments to stitch, rugs to braid and weave, jellies and fruits, pickles and preserves to put up in season. Knitting mills have relieved toiling fingers of the labor of constructing stockings and underwear; rugs and carpets are wrought cheaply in factories, embroidery is done by machinery, and if a housewife prefers to continue canning vegetables and fruits for her table the work is made light for her by porcelain lined preserving kettles, air tight, rubber sealed jars, and patent lifters, holders and sealers for filling and sealing the jars with boiling hot fruit with a rapidity that makes it possible to put up fifty jars of fruit, with less effort than our grandmothers expended to preserve five.

ANOTHER WOMAN CURED

By Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound

Gardiner, Maine.—"I have been a great sufferer from organic troubles and a severe female weakness. The doctor said I would have to go to the hospital for an operation, but I could not bear to think of it. I decided to try Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound and Sanative Wash—and was entirely cured after three months' use of them."—Mrs. S. A. Williams, R. F. D. No. 14, Box 39, Gardiner, Me.

No woman should submit to a surgical operation, which may mean death, until she has given Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound, made exclusively from roots and herbs, a fair trial.

This famous medicine for women has for thirty years proved to be the most valuable tonic and renewer of the female organism. Women residing in almost every city and town in the United States bear willing testimony to the wonderful virtue of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound. It cures female ills, and creates radiant, buoyant female health. If you are ill, for your own sake as well as those you love, give it a trial.

Mrs. Pinkham, at Lynn, Mass., invites all sick women to write her for advice. Her advice is free, and always helpful.

Perfectly Unprejudiced.

Here the judge took a hand in examining the veniremen.

"You don't seem to understand the questions addressed to you by the attorneys," he said. "What they want to know is whether you have formed or expressed any opinion in this case. That is to say, have you told anybody whether or not you believe the defendant guilty of the crime charged against him, or have you said to anybody that you believe him to be innocent?"

"Course not, judge," answered the venireman; "it ain't necessary fur me to 'xpress no opinion about him. I've knowed him far thirty years, an' I know blame well he stole the cow——"

Unexpected Prize.

With a deftness acquired by long and patient practice the pickpocket extracted an old but well-filled purse from the hip pocket of the unsuspecting old gentleman with the beaming countenance against whom he had carelessly brushed when leaving the Tube station, and on reaching a secluded place he opened it.

The contents had been wrapped with great care in numerous thicknesses of blank paper. Removing the wrappings one by one he found in the center of the package a card with this inscription on it:

Opening of Cheyenne River Indian Reservation in South Dakota

Registration Dates, Oct. 4 to 23, inclusive.

The General Land Office at Washington has designated Le Beau and Aberdeen, So. Dak., on the Minneapolis & St. Louis R. R. as registration points.

Le Beau, which is the Missouri River terminus of the Minneapolis & St. Louis R. R., is located on the Missouri River, opposite the Reservation, and is the nearest railroad station to three-fifths of the land.

Aberdeen, the other registration point, is the chief city in northern South Dakota.

These points are reached best by the Iowa Central and Minneapolis & St. Louis R. R. lines.

There will be about 14,000 quarter sections allotted to settlers. The land lays well for farming over most of the reservation. The soil is a light loam and is very fertile. It is similar to that in the counties east of the River, where the land sells from $25.00 to $30.00 per acre. Lignite coal is found over a great part of the reservation.

Who May Secure a Homestead—Under the homestead laws of the United States, any person, male or female who is not the owner of more than 160 acres of land in any state or territory, who is a native born citizen of the United States, or has been naturalized, or declared his intention to become a naturalized citizen of the United States (i.e., one who has taken out his first papers of citizenship), who is over the age of 21 years or the head of a family, may make a homestead entry of not exceeding 160 acres of any of the unoccupied lands of the United States.

Have Heat Brought To You

When your bed-room, bath-room or dining room is chilly, you may have heat brought to you in just the degree you desire. It is easy when you have a

PERFECTION Oil Heater

(Equipped with Smokeless Device)

available. Place the heater where the cold is most annoying, strike a match.

No fuss—no flurry—no smell—and, above all, no smoke, even though you turn the wick as high as it will go.

The temperature runs up quickly. In ten minutes the average sized room glows with cheer and comfort that genial heat brings—the heat that is smokeless and odorless.

Automatic Smokeless Device which automatically locks and absolutely prevents smoke, by keeping the wick out of the smoke zone, is on the Perfection only.

The solid brass font holds four quarts, which gives a full-head flame for nine hours.

Flame burns from side of wick instead of from the top. The brass wick carrier does not rust and clog the wick. Damper top, cool handle.

Aluminum metal window frames that heat cannot tarnish. Japan or nickel finish. Various styles and finishes.

Calf Mangers.

A form of combined stanchion and manger for calf feeding is illustrated in a bulletin published by the Michigan Experiment Station and is recommended as being very convenient. The principle on which the stanchion is built is not claimed to be new; the use dates back a number of decades, but the especial application and adjustment of the one hereafter described presents some new features. This particular model is produced as the result of three years' trial, having undergone several changes since the first one was installed. This appliance can be adjusted so as to accommodate the calf from birth up to twelve months of age. The calves are confined in the stanchions at feeding time only. After the calf has been secured the milk bucket is placed in the manger; when the milk is consumed the bucket is removed and ensilage and meal supplied, followed by hay. By using this stanchion method of feeding the maximum number of calves can be kept in a minimum amount of space in a clean, healthy, thrifty condition, providing they are given access to outdoor yardage. The average size of the four calf pens in the grade herd barn accommodating six calves each, is 9 feet 9 inches by 14 feet 10 inches, and three occupied by five each are 10½ feet by 11½ feet 9 inches. Of course, in all cases except one the calves have access to yardage at will.

VIEW SHOWING MANGER.

Referring to the illustration for detailed description, the bottom of the manger, 18 inches wide, consisting of 2-inch hemlock, is 6 inches above the floor. As the front of the manger is built on rather than against the bottom it leaves the inside bottom measurement of the manger 16 inches. The side of the manger over which the calf's neck is placed in feeding is 8 inches above the bottom, one-half of this distance being taken up by a 2x4, the balance by the bottom frame-work of the stanchion resting on it. The top part of the manger over which the calf feeds is 15 inches above the floor and should not be made higher, as even this is rather high for the new born calf. The youngest calves can feed over this, but should not be left fastened during the day, as they could not lie down comfortably. The side of the manger next the feed alley is practically 2 feet high and 2½ feet above the floor; the slope given to this part of the manger is a very decided advantage, especially in placing and removing buckets while the calf is fastened in the stanchion; even more slope than that indicated would be well. The manger is partitioned off every two feet; this should be the minimum width, for while it is ample room for the young calves, even more room would be desirable for the roughage of the older ones. The manger partitions extend upward as far as the curved line shown in the illustration, but this is the most faulty feature of the fixture, as it is possible for one calf to reach over and suck another one's ears if the meal and ensilage is not promptly supplied after the milk is consumed, though this rarely happens. A more perfect manger division will be made by boarding up from the manger to the dotted line shown between A B. The front or stanchion part of the fixture is 3 feet 6½ inches high and slopes away from the manger to increase its capacity and give the calf the benefit of a little more spread in throwing the head up to remove it from the open stanchion. The stanchions are made of well-seasoned 1-inch elm and no breaks have occurred thus far. The youngest calves do not require more than five inches space for the neck when confined. The stanchion frames are bored with a number of holes so that the movable upright pieces can be shifted according to the size of the calf. As calves approach the yearling stage and their horns interfere with the working of the stanchion the movable piece may be removed and the animal allowed to go free while feeding. This system has given the utmost satisfaction, permitting calves to be fed individually according to their needs and entirely preventing the many bad habits so frequently acquired by the pail fed calf.

Getting Rid of Stumps.

Since the discovery of that region constituting part of the present State of Washington the fir stump has blocked the progress of civilization west of the Cascades, from Oregon to British Columbia. Science has found ways to span the State's rivers, tunnel its mountains and irrigate its deserts, but until recently it has been unable to cope with the fir stump. Bulky, firm-rooted in the earth, and so saturated with pitch that it will not decay, it has defied everything but dynamite, and that costs about $3 a stump, with an equal amount to cover the expenses of the donkey engine necessary to remove the roots when the main body of the stump has been shattered. Clearly such a costly process can not be used for agricultural purposes in a heavily timbered country.

Such was the situation when, three years ago, an enterprising farmer conceived the idea of burning out the stumps by forced draft. After many experiments he finally got a 4 horse-power donkey engine, attached a 6-inch American blower, and over this he fitted a tin case with twelve tubes leading from it. To these he attached pieces of garden hose and to the ends iron pipe. Then he bored a hole in the stump, and, dropping in a live coal, inserted a pipe and started the engine. In a few moments the hole was aflame, and soon a dozen stumps were blazing, although it was the wet season and the monsters were sodden with water.—Technical World.

Materials for the Silo.

Ensilage is being used more and more for general farm stock, being fed to some extent to the calves, the market steers and the horses. It probably requires a little higher grade of skill to manage a farm with the silo system. There is room for judgment in putting up the silo, in handling the crop and filling the silo, to say nothing of its management winter and summer and the right plan of feeding. There is considerable to learn for the farmer who has always practiced the hay, grain and roots system. Yet the experience of those who have made the change seems to indicate that there is no need of making serious mistakes even the first year, while the new system nearly always gives satisfaction under the circumstances mentioned. Perhaps not every dairy farmer needs a silo, but it can not be denied that a great many more silos are needed than have yet been put up.

The Yolks of Eggs.

The color of the yolk of the egg seems often to be effected very noticeably by a change in the food. When fowls are closely confined in winter or summer, it often happens, especially if a ration is deficient in green food, that the yolks are pale colored. In one instance a much deeper orange color in the yolk followed a change in feeding to green clover and alfalfa. One lot, where pale colored yolks were the rule, laid eggs with orange colored yolks after they had been given the run of a barn floor covered with dry clover chaff and leaves. A change in color of butter is often noticeable in the same way when cows are turned to pasture after dry feed.

Rubber Covered Roads.

Experiments with rubber asphalt roadways covering a period of six years are reported to have shown very satisfactory results. Rubber asphalt is claimed to be more plastic and more adhesive than pure asphalt and resists higher temperatures. This product, which is manufactured under a patented process, permits cold applications of the asphalt, which are said to possess all the advantages of hot compressed asphalt without its drawbacks.

Farm Notes.

It is better to sow rutabaga turnips in rows than broadcast.

The best cows are the ones that the careful dairyman raises for himself.

Rotation must be practiced in the garden or truck field to obtain the best results.

Black Winter or Spanish radishes should be sown in August or September with turnips.

It has been said that "weeds are the devil's flower." Certain it is that they play the mischief with a crop.

For best results in the vineyard plenty of water is necessary. During the hot season sub-irrigation is advisable.

A fall crop of potatoes will be found profitable, if the grower has kept his land in good tilth during the summer.

Cold air will not injure sheep, but a wet coat and a cold wind may prove as dangerous as it would with any other animal.

All decaying cabbage should be dug up and destroyed. Black rot and other fungus diseases and insect pests will thus be held back.

All rubbish should be removed from the garden before it is plowed. Debris of any sort is annoying and interferes with cultivation.

Sunshine and air are essential to health in chickens as well as any other livestock on the farm. See that the place where they are kept has windows to let the sunshine in and ventilators to bring in the fresh air.

The first shoes put on a colt are of the most important consideration, for much of the after condition and development of the animal depends upon his proper handling at this time. A mistake in the beginning is apt to leave a life-long defect.

Prune Charlotte.

Stew 1½ pounds of prunes, pit them and sweeten with a cupful of sugar. Line a well-buttered pudding dish with strips of bread and butter or buttered toast. Pour in the prunes and flavor with a teaspoonful of vanilla. Cover with bread and butter strips and bake in a moderate oven until lightly browned. When done turn out, sift sugar over it and serve with cream.

Pickled Onions.

After peeling the onions throw them at once into boiling vinegar, of which a quart is to be allowed to a quart of onions. In this vinegar there should previously have been boiled two teaspoonfuls of salt and an ounce of pepper in the kernel. Boil the onions about five minutes, put into glass jars, and when cold cover or seal till wanted for use.

Canned Corn and Tomatoes.

Cut the corn from four dozen freshly boiled ears and add to them three dozen peeled, ripe tomatoes, chopped. Add salt to taste and put into a porcelain-lined kettle. Bring to a hard boil, cook for a minute, then fill jars standing in boiling water with the scalding mixture, and, while these are still overflowing, fasten down air-tight lids.

Creamed Ham With Cheese.

Melt one and one-half tablespoons of butter, blend in an equal quantity of flour, add slowly one and one-half cups of milk, stir until smooth, season with a dash of cayenne, add one cup of finely chopped, cooked ham and four tablespoons of grated cheese. Stir until the cheese melts, spread on slices of toasted bread and serve at once.

Soft Caramels.

For one pound of brown sugar allow one cupful of milk, a tablespoonful and a-half of butter and half a cake grated chocolate. Cook nine minutes, take from the fire and stir steadily five minutes, but not until too stiff to pour. Turn into a buttered pan and mark in squares. This candy will be crumbly and rich.

Grape Juice.

Stem twelve quarts of grapes and put them into a large preserving kettle. Add two quarts of water, bring slowly to the boil and strain, pressing out all the juice. Return the juice to the fire, bring to a hard boil and pour, scalding hot, into bottles set in hot water. Seal immediately.

Okra.

Select young okra, wash well, and cut into half-inch lengths. Put over the fire in slightly salted water and stew until tender, drain, stir in a great spoonful of butter, season with pepper and salt and serve.

Hard Sauce.

Into a cupful of fine powdered sugar work two tablespoonfuls of soft butter. Beat until soft and white, then add the juice of a lemon and a little nutmeg, or any flavoring preferred. Set in the ice chest to harden until needed.

No-Egg Gingerbread.

One cup molasses, two tablespoons sugar, two good tablespoons lard or butter, one teaspoon soda. Beat well a little ginger, cinnamon, salt and a tablespoon vinegar, one cup cold water Flour to thicken.

Fig Filling for Cake.

Grate a large sour apple that has been peeled; add to it a pound of chopped figs and a small cup of sugar. Boil all together to a paste and keep in jelly glasses for use.

White Mountain Cake.

Three cups of sugar, one cup of butter, one-half cup of sweet milk, whites of ten eggs, one teaspoonful of baking powder sifted with the flour.

Peanut Butter.

Shell freshly-roasted peanuts and grind them to a fine powder. Into this powder stir half as much butter and rub to a smooth paste.

Short Suggestions.

Jellies often refuse to jell when put into large receptacles.

When frying mush dip the slices first in the white of an egg. This makes it crisp.

When broiling halibut cover the fish with minced green pepper. The seasoning will be found to be delicious.

After washing the lamp chimney polish it with dry salt. It makes the glass bright and will prevent it breaking.

A vanilla bean kept in the sugar box will impart a delicious flavor to the sugar. This is a bit of advice from a French chef.

Salt thrown into the oven immediately after anything has been burned in it will make the objectionable odor less disagreeable.

A fruit jar rubber slipped over the projected end of a teapot lid will prevent the lid from dancing up and down when the kettle boils.

Grind a handful of sunflower seeds and give them to the canary. The birds relish the tender pieces that are found among the seeds.

Green grapes and elderberry make a delicious combination for a jelly. The proportion is twice as much of the elderberry as the grape.

When running dates, figs or raisins through the food chopper, add a few drops of lemon juice. It will do much toward preventing the fruit from clogging the chopper.

A delicious salad is made from canned cherries and pecan nuts tossed up with a well-mixed French dressing. Served on leaves of lettuce hearts it is as pretty as it is tasty.

A housewife who never misses an opportunity for improving her table says that she always keeps a vanilla bean or two in her sugar jar. It imparts a flavor that is delightful.

BABY'S WATERY ECZEMA

Itched and Scratched Until Blood Ran—$50 Spent on Useless Treatments—Disease Seemed Incurable—Cured by Cuticura for $1.50.

"When my little boy was two and a half months old he broke out on both cheeks with eczema. It was the itchy, watery kind and we had to keep his little hands wrapped up all the time, and if he would happen to get them uncovered he would claw his face till the blood streamed down on his clothing. We called in a physician at once, but he gave an ointment which was so severe that my babe would scream when it was put on. We changed doctors and medicines until we had spent fifty dollars or more and baby was getting worse. I was so worn out watching and caring for him night and day that I almost felt sure the disease was incurable. But finally reading of the good results of the Cuticura Remedies, I determined to try them. I can truthfully say I was more than surprised, for I bought only a dollar and a half's worth of the Cuticura Remedies (Cuticura Soap, Ointment and Pills), and they did more good than all my doctors' medicines I had tried, and in fact entirely cured him. His face is perfectly clear of the least spot or scar of anything. Mrs. W. M. Comerer, Burnt Cabins, Pa., Sept. 15, 1908."

Defrauded the Government.

Franking privileges were greatly abused in days gone by. The government employe's friends shared in his opportunities. In a letter written by Wordsworth in 1815 the poet said: "By means of a friend in London I can have my letters free. His name is Lamb, and if you add an 'e' to his name he will not open the letters. Direct as below without anything further—'Mr. Lambe, India House, London.'" Coleridge, too, saw that a postage saved was a postage gained, and made use of the Mr. Lamb of the India House—Charles Lamb.

An Indelible Record.

A way of deciding dates of certain important events is suggested by the following anecdote from Lippincott's. The parents of a college son were disputing as to the date of their last letter to their "hopeful," from whom, somewhat to the distress of the mother, they had not heard for some time.

"Are you sure, Thomas," asked the mother, unconvinced, "that it was on the 12th that you last wrote to Dick?"

"Absolutely!" was the father's decisive response. "I looked it up in my check book this morning."

Aids Nature

The great success of Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery in curing weak stomachs, wasted bodies, weak lungs, and obstinate and lingering coughs, is based on the recognition of the fundamental truth that "Golden Medical Discovery" supplies Nature with body-building, tissue-repairing, muscle-making materials, in condensed and concentrated form. With this help Nature supplies the necessary strength to the stomach to digest food, build up the body and thereby throw off lingering obstinate coughs. The "Discovery" re-establishes the digestive and nutritive organs in sound health, purifies and enriches the blood, and nourishes the nerves—in short establishes sound vigorous health.

If your dealer offers something "just as good," it is probably better FOR HIM—it pays better. But you are thinking of the cure not the profit, so there's nothing "just as good" for you. Say so.

Irish Legal Wits.

The mots of the celebrated wits—Harry Deane Grady, Lysaght and Keller—of the Irish bar early in the last century are now in large measure forgotten. Some few are, however, on record. Harry Deane Grady, a leader of the Munster bar, voted in the Irish house of commons to support the union against the wishes of his constituents, one of whom remonstrated indignantly with him on his intended course of action. "What, do you mean to sell your country?" "Yes," was the cool reply, "and very happy I am to have a country to sell."

Ned Lysaght, a celebrated wit and poetaster of the period, in very embarrassed circumstances, applied to Mr. La Touche, the well known banker, for a place in his establishment. "What situation, my dear Lysaght, could possibly suit you?" said his friend, who felt himself in a difficulty. "Not only one, but two," was the reply. "Pray, what are they?" "If you will only, my dear La Touche, make me cashier for one day I'll become runner the next."—London Law Notes.

They Can't Budge It

No amount of force or persuasion on the part of the imitators is great enough to even budge it from its present firm hold on the minds of the people. This has been emphatically demonstrated several times during the past few years. Imitations have come and gone, but Kellogg's goes on with an ever increasing demand. This proves that the people won't be fooled by inferior quality. They know the goodness of Kellogg's—and they invariably come back to it. Try it yourself today. At all Grocers.

Spencerville

M. A. High is quite ill at this writing. Counsel was held Friday by Drs. Shook and Bowman.

John Moody, Sr., had one of his bad spells again last week.

Mrs. David Watson, on the county line, is in very poor health at present.

John Means has more business on hands than a one horse lawyer. He is agent for two nurseries, one seed house, one publishing house, reporter for three or four newspapers and is justice of the peace to boot. Now is the time for his deliveries, and I tell you he is busy.

John Armstrong, of near Jackson Center, had the misfortune to break his leg last Monday evening.

Frank Grover and wife, of St. Johns, spent Sunday with Lewis Wasson and wife.

John Means had a fine lot of trees at Spencerville Friday. John has a good trade in the tree business. Any one wanting trees should see him.

Isarel Layman started for St. Joe Saturday with a load of oats. His wagon wheel ran off twice before he got there. Isarel says this is the last time that wagon will ever leave the farm.

The new hardware store here is occupied now. It is a fine building and is built of cement blocks. It would be a fine ornament for any town in the county.

Joe B. Halfley has rented his farm to Bert Rhoads. Joe has bought half of the St. Joe grist mill. Success to you, Joe.

Newville

The children won in the Sunday school contest. Collection $4.39, and 150 were present. Everyone congratulates them as their work was well done. The ones defeated are now making preparations to entertain the winners.

Mr. and Mrs. Keoppe entertained at dinner Sunday, Rev. F. A. Thomas and wife and Mrs. H. B. Akins.

The box social was well patronized, and the program was well rendered.

Letha Enzor and Mary Strong were home from Butler Saturday and Sunday.

Howard Benninghoff came home from Waterloo Saturday. Mr. Wilmar, of Angola, was also a guest here Saturday and Sunday.

Mrs. Arvilla Miller is visiting friends at Hicksville this week.

John Whitehurst has bought the Hobb farm.

Miss Rose Brunson was here from Garrett a part of last week.

Mrs. Effie Burrows is here from Youngstown, Ohio, visiting her parents.

Mr. and Mrs. Wm. Meeks were at Hicksville, Wednesday of last week, to see Mr. Meeks' sister, Mrs. Crawford and her son, who is very low at the home of Lewis Griest.

Mesdames Waterman and Presler, of Hicksville, were guests of Ross Nelson and wife last Thursday.

D. J. Blair has moved his family in a part of his mother's house in order to help take care of her.

Edgerton

We would like to have our Waterloo friend tell us what their first item in last week's paper was.

Geo. Firestone of western Nebraska visited with Chris Everhart and family last Friday and Saturday.

William Birdsell moved his family to Defiance this week, where he and his son have a creamery.

Harry Farnham and family of Auburn spent Sunday with May Farnham of this place.

W. H. Baker spent Sunday with his family at Edgerton. He is working on a steam shovel at Millersberg, Ind.

Willis Mavis made a business trip to Butler Monday.

Miss Grace Knight of Kendallville visited from Friday till Sunday with her brother Albert Knight and family.

Otis Goeltzenleuchter and J. A. Jennings attended K. of P. lodge at Butler last Tuesday evening. They report a fine time.

Herbert Sharp and family attended the wedding of their son Thomas, at Ashley, last Wednesday.

Harley Sharp of Milford, Ind., spent the first of the week with his parents near Edgerton.

David Cover was in Bryan on business last Monday.

Howard Bros. have their garage nearly completed. It is a cement block building. They expect to manufacture auto buggies and also do repair work.

According to the article in last week's Earth taken from the Elkhart paper, the division is an assured thing for Edgerton and the changes that they are making in the tracks here all go to show that there is something doing and the officials were here last Friday with the blue prints looking them over. They expect to begin work on the round house and yards in the early spring.

Chas. Boos has gone to Hillsdale, Mich., where he expects to work at the butcher business.

The L. S. & M. S. has put a telegraph and switch tenders office just east of the river where the third and fourth tracks end.

Chas. Madden, of Butler, was in Edgerton on business last Tuesday.

Paul Fusselman, of Ada, Ohio, spent over Sunday with his parents.

Our basket ball girls were over at Hamilton last Saturday and beat the pond girls 18 to 12.

Our school boys were over at Butler last Saturday and had a tussel with the school boys there. Score 6 to 12 in favor of our boys. Boys, come down, and you will get a more beating than that.

The Edon foot ball team was to come to Edgerton last Saturday to play our boys, but did not come. That's right, boys, for you would have got badly beaten had you come.

The L. S. & M. S. officials were in Edgerton last Friday looking over the ground for the new round house and sidings. They had the blue print of the grounds with them. They took dinner at Hotel Mortland.

Franklin

William Rohrbaugh, of Waterloo, is working for his brother this week who is quite ill.

Arthur Whitman finished this season's work for Clem Mitchell last Wednesday.

F. A. Huntington, wife and mother and Grandpa Oberlin visited a few days with relatives in Williams county, Ohio, last week.

Mr. and. Mrs. Roscoe Yarlott entertained at dinner, Sunday, Freeman Fifer and wife and Miss Mahala Huntington.

Ora Deems and Mr. Johnson are on a hunting trip in Maine.

Mr. and Mrs. Charles Imhof were visitors at Metz over Sunday.

Patterson-Fletcher Company Clothing Store

15,640 SQUARE FEET OF FLOOR SPACE IS GIVEN TO MEN'S AND BOYS' WEARABLES OR MORE THAN IS USED BY ANY OTHER THREE CLOTHING STORES IN FORT WAYNE

GREAT VALUES

In the kind of Clothing that men and boys want to wear has made our store what it is. We have received and placed in stock the greatest line of men's and boys' wearables that can be found in the state. Our purchases for Fall and Winter are now over $30,000.00 more than last year. We know what the men and boys of Fort Wayne want and we know that if we sell them the kind of Overcoats and Suits they want, at prices $3.00 to $7.00 less than they can be bought elsewhere, we are going to have the business.

READ EVERY WORD

Over twenty-five styles of all-wool worsted suits for men and boys at $10,00. Not a suit that can be bought in any other store in the city for less than $15.00.

Clothcraft pure worsted suits, in over twenty-five styles, at $12.00, which is $4.00 under the price of any other store.

Hart Schaffner & Marx all-wool hand-made suits at $15.00. Not a store in the state sells a Hart, Schaffner & Marx suit of any kind for less than $20.00.

At $20.00 we show over 120 patterns in Hart Schaffner & Marx fine worsted suits that we will guarantee to be $5.00 to $7.00 less than other stores will sell these suits.

At $25.00 to $45.00 we are in a class by ourselves, showing over 100 patterns in each of the lines at $25.00, 28.00, 30.00 and 35.00.

"WE WANT YOUR TRADE"

That is why we make these prices. Men want our goods; that is why our business increased $11,000.00 during September and October, and yet our expenses did not increase one dollar over last year.

NOW LISTEN TO COMMON SENSE—We save thousands of dollars every year by our purchases. We are doing four times the business we did a few years ago. We believe that any school child can see that we can cut our margin of profit 60 percent and still make more money than we did while we were doing the smaller business.

OUR GREAT AMBITION is to give Fort Wayne a clothing store so good that it will be an object for clothing buyers to come miles to to take advantage of our values.

Better Not Get Dyspepsia

If you can help it. Kodol prevents Dyspepsia, by effectually helping Nature to Relieve Indigestion. But don't trifle with Indigestion.

A great many people who have trifled with indigestion, have been sorry for it—when nervous or chronic dyspepsia resulted, and they have not been able to cure it.

Use Kodol and prevent having Dyspepsia.

Everyone is subject to indigestion. Stomach derangement follows stomach abuse, just as naturally and just as surely as a sound and healthy stomach results upon the taking of Kodol.

When you experience sourness of stomach, belching of gas and nauseating fluid, bloated sensation, gnawing pain in the pit of the stomach, heart burn (so-called), diarrhoea, headaches, dullness or chronic tired feeling—you need Kodol. And then the quicker you take Kodol—the better. Eat what you want, let Kodol digest it.

Ordinary pepsin "dyspepsia tablets," physics, etc., are not likely to be of much benefit to you, in digestive ailments. Pepsin is only a partial digester—and physics are not digesters at all.

Kodol is a perfect digester. If you could see Kodol digesting every particle of food, of all kinds, in the glass test-tubes in our laboratories, you would know this just as well as we do.

Nature and Kodol will always cure a sick stomach—but in order to be cured, the stomach must rest. That is what Kodol does—rests the stomach, while the stomach gets well. Just as simple as A, B, C.

Our Guarantee

Go to your druggist today and get a dollar bottle. Then after you have used the entire contents of the bottle if you can honestly say, that it has not done you any good, return the bottle to the druggist and he will refund your money without question or delay. We will then pay the druggist for the bottle. Don't hesitate, all druggists know that our guarantee is good. This offer applies to the large bottle only and to but one in a family. The large bottle contains 2½ times as much as the fifty cents bottle.

Kodol is prepared at the laboratories of E. C. DeWitt & Co., Chicago.

T. & C. MOTORMAN WAS ELECTROCUTED

Attempted to Turn on Headlight Without Pulling Down the Trolley

(Courier)

Attempting to make some electrical connections on his car and failing to pull down the connecting switch, Andrew Mong, a motorman on the Toledo & Chicago Interurban railway, rooming at Kendallville, was electrocuted at Huntertown at 4:20 Sunday afternoon in the presence of a number of citizens and fellow workmen. The distressing accident occurred in front of the interurban station and he met his death so quickly that there was no chance for him to escape. Mong was in charge of train No. 22, due at Huntertown at 4:19, and the shock came from the headlight.

When the car stopped Mong leaped from the front end and attempted to turn on the headlight. The connecting switch was on full voltage and he neglected to turn it out, although he had been cautioned time and time again by other trainmen to look out for it. When he touched the switch he fell to the ground in a semi-conscious condition and was carried into the station, where he died a few minutes later. The voltage of electricity to the headlight is but 250, and as there was no mark or burn on his body it is thought that the electric shock caused heart failure.

Motorman Mong had only been running on this division a short time and was not fully acquainted with the equipment that is used by the T. & C. I. Co. He was about forty years old and a widower. Coroner Kesler, of Fort Wayne, was called, also officials at Kendallville and Garrett were notified and the remains taken to Kendallville. Short services were held at his room this morning and the remains shipped to Danville, Ill., his former home.

BIRTHDAY AND THANKSGIVING COMBINED

Miss Lora Kauffman's Friends Plan a Pleasant Surprise

John Kiplinger and wife and Albert Kauffman and wife entertained at the formers' home Saturday evening, Nov. 13, a party of young people in honor of Miss Lora Kauffman's 16th birthday and Thanksgiving combined. The rooms were decorated with autumn crepe paper and flags, chrysanthemums and red bitter-sweet. The dining room was decorated with yellow and red crepe paper, the side board covered in autumn crepe paper and bitter-sweet berries and three large pumpkins placed upon it filled with red, yellow and white chrysanthemums and above that was a hand painted motto appropriate for the occasion. The table decorations were elegant.

Music and games were indulged in before supper and after supper the guests were invited to go out on a thanksgiving time and hunt nuts and quail, the one finding the most of each contest were each rewarded a prize. They were then invited to a room where a line contained Thanksgiving postals. Each one was to take their souvenier in their teeth anduntie them. One of the postals was a prize winner and the one who got that received a prize.

Miss Kauffman was the recipient of three books and forty postals from the guests and the parents presented her with a gold watch.

After recovering somewhat from the surprise, she arose to her feet and with tear dimmed eyes and a few but well chosen words she thanked each and every one. The guests departed after the midnight hour expressing themselves as being delightfully entertained, and wishing many more returns of the day.

SCHOOL NOTES

Pithy Paragraphs From Our Public Schools

SENIOR NOTES

The program last Friday morning consisted of two numbers: A piano duet by Zura Shumaker and Helen Garber and a piano solo by LaNore Dunten. The next program will be given by the eighth grade.

Miss A. in English—"Well, don't you know that anyway?"

Robert—"No, what do you think I am, a walking encyclopedia?"

During the rain Tuesday afternoon the high school room was so dark that it was necessary to turn the lights on.

That poor little Freshie (D. A. B.) certainly has a time sneezing. We feel sorry (?) for him.

The commercial arithmetic class is anticipating a great time when the "inspector" comes. Another chance to show our wisdom (?)

JUNIOR NOTES

Harmon Parker was absent Monday.

Tuesday about 3:30 o'clock Miss A. turned on the lights. It is the first we have used them during school hours.

Mr. A. is testing the B. H. S. to see if it would not be safe for him to adopt the honor system.

Roy E. Apt was absent Tuesday morning.

We have just finished another book in geometry.

Oh! that fourth year commercial class.

Last Saturday the Edon high school played the B. H. S. a game of foot ball. It took Butler just three downs to make the first touchdown. This got the nerve of the Edon players and it was an easy matter for Butler to make a couple more the same half. The Edon players were somewhat larger than those of the B. H. S., but that did not seem to make much difference. Everyone played clean foot ball. The score was 15 to 0 in favor of Butler.

It has been moved and seconded that when we have another game the manager gives the principal and assistant principal complimentary tickets.

SOPHOMORE NOTES

The English class has finished Julius Caesar and it has proved a very interesting study.

(H. C.) Proserpina was the wife of Hades.

Mr. Austin conducted a very beneficial revival meeting Tuesday morning.

We understand that the rings, in the old Roman days, were so large that some people were advised to wear them on their legs.

We may "look wise," but we haven't got quite so far as to "tattle."

It is raining out. The phone bell rings—"Papa will be there in a minute, Edwin."

Oh! you electric lights.

It is not quite election time, but then we found a subject Tuesday morning and we all voted on it.

Does anyone read novels in school? "Fess up."

FRESHMEN NOTES

Wallace Knepper has been absent several days on account of sickness.

Audra!! Why don't you study your lesson.

Poor Mae! She never has time.

Carrie Potter was absent Monday forenoon.

Mr. A. in Botany Class—"If you will take an egg tine and put it under a fork you can lift pp a small portion of it."

Mr. A. says fish are the staff of life. That sounds rather fishy to us.

We had a Botany test Tuesday. It was greatly enjoyed by all.

Local Option Meeting

Next Sunday evening, Nov. 21, Mr. B. C. VanHeyde, an ex-saloon keeper, will deliver an address at the Thompson opera house, to which all the people of Butler and vicinity are invited. Mr. VanHeyde has an excellent stereopticon with a large number of views which he will throw on the canvass, showing the saloon inside and out. He tells his experience in the business and gives facts and figures to prove his contentions. On Tuesday evening E. S. Shumaker, state superintendent of the Anti Saloon League, will address the people at Thompson's opera house. Mr. Shumaker is a strong speaker and a man we can all make an effort to hear. On Friday afternoon at 2:30 p. m., if the weather is fit for children to be out, a children's parade will be held. This will take place only on condition that the streets are dry and fit for children to be out. After the parade several speakers will address the people at the opera house.

LETTER FROM DECATUR, ALABAMA

Joseph Everttts Writes Interesting Letter About the Crops in the State of Sunshine

Decatur, Ala., Nov. 10, 1909.

EDITOR BUTLER HERALD:

Dear Sir—It has been some time since I wrote to you, but I have not forgotten you and my friends in Indiana. Alabama is surely a state of sunshine—the weather has been just as fine as I could wish it, and I am noted for being a crank in regard to the weather. We have had six rainy days since the 9th of September and it is raining today.

Well I told you a coal story in my last letter, now keep your hat on this is a fish story. Saturday I was fishing with old Sam Thompson, a negro preacher and an old slave. I think that Sam understood catching catfish, but they would not catch on for us that day. They generally have three or four fish poles, none of your three to five dollar poles, but any good old hickory or any kind that will do to tie a line to. The line is about twelve or fifteen feet longer than the pole with about two ounces of lead for a sinker. The pole is sunk firmly in the bank of the river. The bait is adjusted to the hook, then the lead and hook is cast out into the river as far as the line will reach. After Sam had fixed my hooks for me he gave me the following instructions: "Now massa Joe you sat rite down dar an keep your eye on dat dar pole, an when dat dar pole go down mighty sudden you want to den got holt on dat dar pole, kas why I don tell you he's goin to make fer deep water mighty sudden." Well, I followed the instructions. After sitting there for about three hours the pole went down. I got hold of the pole and after quite a fight I landed him. In place of a catfish it was a water dog that would weigh about two and one-half pounds. Well, to make a long story short I caught another one about the same size. I did not get any catfish, but Sam assured me "dey was in de riber, massa Joe," and I have saw them in the markets at Decatur that they said weighed 73 pounds and plenty that would go from four to nine pounds. They sell at 10 to 15 cents per pound.

The cotton is about all picked. It has about all been marketed at from 11 to 15 cents per pound. There is lots of oats sowed here now, and some is coming up. It makes better feed than when it is sowed in the month of February. They cut it just before it is ripe and feed it in the straw. I sowed three acres of wheat and it is looking fine, and is the talk of the whole town. They tell me wheat was grown here years ago and it was a success. It yielded from 13 to 33 bushels per acre, at that time I never saw wheat look better in Indiana, but I can't tell how it is going to yield. There has nothing hurt corn, and cotton has grown here for 70 to 80 years. All this country needs is some one to work the ground intelligently. As you go through the country you can see by the buildings and the good crops just where the northern man is leaving his footprints and I don't think there is anyone in the world today that has any idea of the undeveloped wealth of the south. I don't think the northener and the southern people understood each other, if they had there would never have been any war. The people I have met here are the finest people in the world. No one could be used any better than I have been used. If I was to tell you the six and eight year old Negroes herehave better names than two-thirds of the northern grown people, you would say I guess not, but such is the truth.

We are all well and like our home in Dixie splendid. I have gained seven pounds since I came here. Corn is 75 cents per 100 pounds; sweet potatoes, 75 cents per bushel; eggs, 30 cents per dozen; butter 28 cents per pound; chickens, 11 to 14 cents per pound; turkeys, $1 each. I have an article about ready to send you about some old slavery stories I have heard. I will mail it to you in two or three weeks.

Yours very truly,
JOSEPH W. EVERTTS,
Box 84. Decatur, Ala.

The Corn and Poultry Show

Mr. D. D. Melroy informs us that preparations are being made for the corn and poultry exhibit to be held in this city December second, third and fourth. The business men are giving liberally in the way of specials. Eugene Sites of Elyria, Ohio will judge both the corn and poultry exhibit. He is a graduate of the corn school at Purdue as well as a poultry judge of note. Help it along and make it a big success

THE CITY COUNCIL PROCEEDINGS

Ordinance For The Paving of Broadway and Main Was Read and Approved.

The council met Monday evening, Nov. 15, 1909, with all members present.

The committee on streets and alleys report objections to putting a gutter on north end of John street and the said committee was instructed to report to the council at its next meeting whether a gutter should be placed there or whether a ditch or sewer was needed.

The auditing committee report the report of electric light rents for September to be correct and that the superintendent's book for supplies was correct and balanced.

The water works committee report that the pipe for the water main extension is here and that Ben McDonald bids 12½c per foot for the digging and back filing. Moved and seconded that this bid be accepted. Motion carried.

An ordinance approving the plans specifications for the paving of Broadway and Main streets was read and passed on its first reading.

An ordinance declaring the necessity for paving Broadway and Main streets and a part of Green street was read on its first reading and passed.

The electric light report for October was read and referred to auditing committee.

The public depository reported $2.89 interest for October.

The matter of purchasing new fire hose was referred to the chairman of the water works to report at next meeting.

Moved and seconded that the preliminary assessments on the local sewers be accepted. Motion carried.

May Land a Factory

Another factory is now in sight for Butler, and while the proposition is not sufficiently matured to warrant much of a statement at this time, the chances are very good for Butler to land the plum. Attorney E. B. Dunten, William Elden, L. C. Harding and S G. Stone left Thursday to investigate the matter.

New Club Organized

The Bay View Reading Circle met and organized last Wednesday afternoon at the home of Mrs. A. S. Powers, with the following ladies as officers: President, Mrs. J. D. Craun; vice president, Mrs. Powers; secretary, Mrs. O. Campbell; treasurer, Mrs. C. Craun. Lesson for Wednesday, Nov. 25, Chap. 1 and 2—Life in Spain. Magazine Article—Madrid. Critic—Mrs. A. S. Kester.

A marriage license was issued by County Clerk Austin, Thursday, to Clarence West, of Hudson, and Miss Alta Buss, of near that place.

Nelson---Poper

On Sunday evening, Nov. 14, 1909, at the home of Mrs. Ackerman on West Main street, at 6:30, Rev. Parker united in marriage Mrs. Dessa Poper and Clarence Nelson.

Both parties are well and favorably known and have the best wishes of all for a happy and prosperous life. They will take up their residence with the groom's parents on Broadway where they will be at home to their friends.

At the home of Mr. and Mrs. Wm. Chard, Thursday, Nov. 4th, 1909, was the scene of a very quiet wedding, when their eldest daughter, Mabel was united in marriage to Claud Wellington Morse. Only the immediate relatives and a few intimate friends of the contracting parties being present to witness the ceremony, performed by Rev. W. H. Keyes.

The groom is the son of Mr. and Mrs. Frank Morse, of Angola, and is manager of the Angola Railway and Power Company and is a highly esteemed young man. The bride is well known in Hamilton and has many friends who will join in congratulations.

The happy couple left immediately for a wedding trip to Chicago, accompanied by Lewis Menzenberger and Miss Ethel Rathbun, of Angola. After their return they will be at home in Angola where they will welcome all their friends.—Hamilton News.

On Saturday evening last occurred the marriage of Oak Husselman of this city and Miss Blanche Cattell, Garrett, the ceremony having been performed by the Rev. W. B. Freeland in the presence of but the necessary witnesses. The couple had planned that the affair should be a secret and in this they were successful to a degree. The knot was tied and they had left the city before even their most intimate friends were aware.—Courier.

Last Friday evening the girls gave a dance at the Crescendo hall in complement to the members of the Crescendo club. In this way they were able to "square" themselves with the boys. At the close of the affair they were invited to the home of Miss LaNore Dunten where light refreshments were served. The boys here showed themselves as appreciative of the evening's pleasure, by their many flowery speeches.

When a cold becomes settled in the system, it will take several days' treatment to cure it, and the best remedy to use is Chamberlain's Cough Remedy. It will cure quicker than any other, and also leaves the system in a natural and healthy condition. Sold by Geo. W. Geddes. 44-1m

If one is at all inclined to talk, the North Pole controversy offers fully as fascinating an opening as the American tariff. It is not necessary to be hampered by much exact knowledge in either case.

Out of the seething turmoil of assertions and contradictions in connection with the discovery of the pole comes the London paper which explains to its readers that Lieutenant Peary did not literally nail the flag to a literal pole, as there is no pole there!

In response to the mother's plea, a New England magistrate agreed to discharge a youth accused of larceny and drunkenness if he would join the navy. The judge was evidently unaware of the rules of the department, for when the youth sought to enlist he was rejected on the ground that the American navy is not a reformatory for the cure of the vicious. Both the army and the navy properly insist that candidates for enlistment shall be of good moral character.

"Souvenir hunting," as it is too charitably styled, has reached a point necessitating stern measures to wipe it out. Hotel proprietors, who are the greatest sufferers, are usually content with adding to the bill, when they detect the thief, the value of goods stolen. That is mistaken leniency. In the interest of public morality such offenders should be handed over to the police for prosecution. With judge and jury doing their duty "souvenir hunting" would soon cease to be popular.

Children? There are millions of them! Taxpayers are groaning everywhere because of the constantly increasing levy upon the resources to build schoolhouses and support schools that the swarming multitude may be given the proper chance or start in life, says the Portland Oregonian. In vain do school trustees exert themselves throughout vacation period of each year to provide room for the increased number of children that each succeeding September sends trooping to the schoolhouse doors demanding admittance. Equally in vain do the "good district fathers" in the rural sections strive to keep ahead of the yearly increasing outflow of juvenile life from the farmhouses of a populous, prosperous land. As for villages, their streets are thronged and their homes and schools are crowded with children. There is no lack of child life anywhere except in the fevered imagination of the alarmist and the homes of the relative few, to whom nature, perhaps for good reasons of her own, has declined to send children.

Government health officers are co-operating with the physicians of various States in an effort to discover the cause of the spread of pellagra, a disease of which no authentic case was recorded in America till seven years ago. Pellagra is distinguished by an eruption of the skin resembling eczema, but it is a much more serious ailment. It frequently causes insanity, and is fatal in more than 50 per cent of the cases. The physicians at present think that it is caused by eating food made from corn which has been spoiled by the appearance of some fungus growth. It prevails in those parts of Europe where corn is commonly used as a food. There are thirty thousand cases of it in Roumania; in certain parts of Italy from one-third to one-half of the population is suffering from it; and in Spain it is said that two persons out of every hundred have it. The disease has been known in Spain since 1735, and in Italy since 1750. It was first noted in the United States in Georgia after the influx of Italians had begun. During the present summer cases have been reported in Massachusetts, in Illinois—there are said to be a hundred and fifty cases in an insane asylum in that State—in North Carolina, Alabama and Mississippi. When the disease in the Illinois insane asylum was diagnosed as pellagra, the use of corn as food was stopped. Pellagra has not hitherto been prevalent in America, it is supposed, for the reason that the climate is better suited to raising and preserving corn than that of southern Europe. It has been suggested that one cause of its appearance here lies in the consumption of corn that has been sent to market before it is thoroughly dry. Such corn heats in the cars, but it is ground up as cattle feed, and doubtless some of it gets into the kitchens. There is no need for any one to be seriously alarmed over the matter, for the average American family eats so many other things besides corn that it is in little danger of contracting the disease.

A Clean Mouth.

Now and then one hears incredible stories of persons, otherwise apparently intelligent and cleanly, going round for months, and even years, with their mouths full of germ-laden, aching, decaying teeth.

These persons will give the most ridiculous reasons for their uncleanly folly. They are too busy, or they have an insane dread of the dentist, or some such nonsense. In the very poor and very ignorant all this may be understood and forgiven, but in other classes it is unpardonable. Luckily their number is small, and their punishment is sure.

Very few of those who are children to-day will be able to say by and by that they suffer on account of neglect of their teeth in youth, but many adults can honestly say so now. The science of dentistry and the mechanics by means of which that science is applied have made enormous strides of late, and will undoubtedly continue to advance in the future.

The modern germ theory of disease as applied to the mouth and teeth has brought about so much exact knowledge of prevention and cure that soon a decayed tooth should be a disgrace to any civilized man.

It is universally accepted that a clean surface does not decay. All decay is caused by germs, and the germs cannot multiply and work evil unless particles of food are left on, under or between the teeth. When these particles are so left they first become softened by the saliva, and then afford lodgment for certain germs which excite an acid fermentation. The acid so formed attacks the enamel of the teeth, and this is finally perforated.

Now the door is opened for the germs of decay to enter. In this minute opening in the enamel they find a sheltered spot where they can increase, and by their action cause the destruction of the vulnerable dentine.

This whole process of the formation of the destructive acid may take place within a single day, if the toilet of the mouth is neglected.

Seeing how easy it is for this destructive work to be started, one should make trips to the dentist very regularly, that damage already done may be repaired, and that the deposits which settle on the teeth in the form of tartar may be cleaned away. This tartar does serious damage as long as it is allowed to stay, and it cannot be removed by any home treatment.—Youth's Companion.

Battle of Boston Town.

Constructively to right of them,
Allegorically to left of them,
Metaphorically in front of them
The imaginary instruments of war constructively thundered;
It was theirs to cogitate upon the reason why,
So that they might differentiate between those who should constructively die
And those who, constructively overwhelmed, should fly—
Otherwise, some responsible head might have blundered.

Into the supposed jaws of death,
Into the for-the-sake-of-arguments jaws of perdition,
Stormed at with theoretical shot and shell,
Rode the metaphysical six hundred:
Bridges succumbed to metaphorical stress,
The constructive heroes perished apparently at the moment of success—
Fatally wounded in the subliminal consciousness,
While, constructively, all the world wondered.

Honor, mathematically, the charge they made,
Euclid's theorems for the part they played,
While the differential calculus and logarithms in mines constructively laid
Detonated and left the ranks constructively sundered—
Subtracted from the constructive jaws of death,
Letting "x" equal the theoretical jaws of perdition,
The problem is to solve the equation trigonometrically,
And we shall have the remainder of the six hundred, constructively.

WHEN THE FROST IS ON THE PUMPKIN.

By JAMES WHITCOMB RILEY.

When the frost is on the pumpkin
and the fodder's in the shock,
And you hear the kyvack and gobble
of the struttin' turkey cock;
And the clackin' of the guineas and the cluckin' of the hens,
And the rooster's hallylooyer as he tiptoes on the fence;
Oh, it's then's the time a feller is a feelin' at his best,
With the risin' sun to greet him
from a night of peaceful rest;
As he leaves the house bareheaded and goes out to feed the stock,
When the frost is on the pumpkin
and the fodder's in the shock.

There's something kind o' hearty-like about the atmosphere
When the heat of summer's over and the coolin' fall is here.
Of course we miss the flowers and the blossoms on the trees,
And the mumble of the hummin'
birds and buzzin' of the bees;
But the air's so appetizin' and the landscape through the haze
Of a crisp and sunny morning of the early autumn days
Is a pictur' that no painter has the colorin' to mock—
When the frost is on the pumpkin
and the fodder's in the shock.

The husky, rusty rustle of the tossels of the corn,
And the raspin' of the tangled leaves, as golden as the morn;
The stubble in the furrows kind o' lonesome-like, but still
A-preachin' sermons to us of the barns they growed to fill;
The straw-stack in the medder, and the reaper in the shed;
The hosses in their stalls below, the clover overhead;
Oh, it sets my heart a-clickin' like the tickin' of a clock
When the frost is on the pumpkin
and the fodder's in the shock.

OUT OF REACH.

Pour, rain!
You cannot get into my heart
Or put out the fire of my soul;
I am safe in a beautiful realm apart
Where the angels of light patrol!
Pour, rain!
You are good, I am told, for the flowers and the grain,
But you beat the the door of my heart in vain.

Blow, wind!
The trees you can buffet and break,
You can trouble the waves of the sea,
You can scatter the petals of many a flower,
But you cannot terrify me!
Blow, wind!
For the country of "Peace and a Quiet Mind"
Is a part of the world you can never find!

Catching His Eye

If Bowman, the assistant bookkeeper, had a heart he was as unconscious of it as he was of any other of the practical working organs that went to make up his physical man.

Bowman loved his big ledgers. He reveled in long, terrifying columns of figures. He liked good things to eat in an unemotional way, which left him unmoved if the steak happened to be done too much or too little. He was devoted to his mother. He enjoyed his pipe in the evening after dinner. However, up to the age of 28 he apparently had never heeded or been disturbed by the swish of a petticoat, nor had let his head be turned even the fraction of an inch by the glance of a bright eye.

He wasn't afraid of girls; in fact, he rather liked them. They were pretty, he thought, on account of the bright colors they wore, and some of them were graceful, so he enjoyed seeing them flash about, but somehow they all looked very much alike to him and he regarded them all with a benevolent indifference. He was quite an ordinary, stout, plain person, who wore big spectacles across his big nose, had a wide, kind face and a twinkle in his eye.

Bowman was probably the only member of the office force who remained unmoved the morning Miss Finley made her first appearance. Quiet and small and dainty as she was, she was yet such a vivid creature that even the manager, who believed that business and social relations should be kept distinctly separate, noted her and asked her name. However, the first time Bowman remembered seeing her was one morning several weeks after her initial appearance, when he raised his eyes from his work to find her standing at his elbow, looking just a trifle audacious, a trifle shy, but very pretty, with a piece of paper held up appealingly in her hand. She laid the paper on the desk in front of Bowman and he noticed that she had to stand on her tiptoes to do it.

"Will you add them for me, Mr. Bowman?" she pleaded. "You don't know how mean they act for me."

Bowman's slight interest in the fluffy topknot immediately changed to a pronounced interest in the column of figures she handed him.

"Certainly," he answered. He ran his pencil rapidly up and down the column, while she stood beside him humming a little tune. In a moment he handed the slip back to her. "I think that fixes you," he said happily.

"Oh, thank you ever so much," she replied, softly. She stood for a moment, sliding the paper back and forth in a ridge at the side of the desk. "I'm afraid you think it was awful funny of me to ask you," she continued, hesitatingly. "You always seem so busy."

"Why, I'm never too busy to help you," he said. With a quiet impersonal pleasure he watched the pretty color surge up into her cheeks. "Or any of the other girls," he added genially.

Miss Finley turned on her little heel and walked away so quickly that Bowman was unaware of the smile that was curling her lips. A little ripple of giggles greeted her as she returned to the stenographers' corner.

"Was it a frost?" inquired Miss Temple.

"Maybe," replied Miss Finley noncommittally. "But one frost doesn't make a winter. You just watch me."

It was perfectly astonishing the number of things Miss Finley found after that which only Bowman could do for her. If the drawers of her desk became refractory and refused to open or shut, only Bowman's strong arm seemed to be considered equal to the task of getting them into working order again. She even got him to sharpen her pencils for her and her frequent appeals to him to know if her hat was on straight set him to wondering philosophically if a girl's hat could ever be considered on straight.

He felt no annoyance when she came to him one day apparently in the deepest despair because she couldn't find one of her hatpins, which was buried deep in the fluffy trimmings of her hat, but afterward it occurred to him that life would be much simplified for them if girls didn't wear such fantastic things.

About a week after this episode Bowman was surprised one morning upon looking over toward the stenographers' corner to discover that Miss Finley's chair was vacant. He was even more surprised at the queer, sinking sensation that took possession of him when he realized that she was not there. His first impulse was to go over and ask where she was, but a sudden fit of shyness seized him and he decided not to. This made him uncomfortable, for shyness and vacillation were entirely new emotions to him. He dragged down one of his beloved ledgers and began writing in it. Instead of figures, he seemed to see a little pointed face in a mist of soft hair.

"I'M NEVER TOO BUSY TO HELP YOU."

At last he stuck his pen behind his ear and gave himself up deliberately to reflection. After some minutes of unproductive mental labor over the problem in hand he turned to the head bookkeeper.

"Here," he said abruptly, "how does a fellow feel when he's in love?"

The head bookkeeper looked at him scornfully. "Come off!" he ejaculated.

"Go on and tell me," urged Bowman. "I'm in earnest. I want to know."

The head bookkeeper looked at him disgustedly over his glasses. "For an everlasting, all-round idiot," he said, "you certainly are the limit. She's got you going, has she?"

Bowman said nothing more, but from his knitted brows and general air of unrest one might have gathered that he was still studying his own emotions.

The next morning he was eagerly watching the door when Miss Finley, looking a little pale from her illness, came in. Without a moment's hesitation he went over to where she was standing. Neither of the other girls had arrived.

"Miss Finley," he said, "I came over to tell you something. I just found it out yesterday. I'm in love with you." He stood back and regarded her with a look of the deepest interest.

She gave a little nervous laugh. "Who told you?" she gasped.

"I found it out myself," he said triumphantly.

"I didn't think I could do it," she said soberly. I told the girls I was going to try just for fun, but I didn't think I could. I told them the other day that I gave it up. I thought you——"

Bowman's face grew stern for a moment. "You did it just for fun!" he said. "You never thought what it might mean to me."

She gave a quick little sobbing sigh. "I did it for fun at first," she said, "but afterward——"

"Well?" demanded Bowman. "Why did you do it afterward?"

"Because I—liked you," she said after a moment's pause.—Chicago News.

PAPA'S ADVICE WAS FOLLOWED.

But "Dad" Didn't Know He Had Been Talking About His Daughter.

"The late Bishop Thomas Frederick Davies of Detroit," said a Detroit man in the Providence Journal, "once told me an interesting story of an elopement. He figured in this elopement as the officiating clergyman. It was in Philadelphia, during his rectorship of St. Peter's.

"It seems that the proprietor of one of the largest dry-goods houses in Philadelphia had noticed for some months the melancholy attitude of his head clerk, a young man whom he held in high regard.

"The clerk's pallor and increasing leanness, his frequent sighs and absent-mindedness worried the millionaire proprietor. He questioned the young man daily. And finally the clerk admitted that he was in love.

"'Well,' said the head, 'marry her. Your salary is big enough.'

"'Ah,' said the clerk sadly, 'you don't understand. She belongs to one of the first families of Philadelphia and her father is a millionaire.'

"'Well, maybe he wasn't when he married. You have a good position and a good name. You are a fair match for any girl,' said the other.

"'It's no use,' sighed the clerk. 'Her parents would not listen to me for one moment.'

"'Then,' said the head, 'elope with her.'

"'Do you advise that?' the clerk asked excitedly.

"'Certainly I do. Is she—— Do I know her?'

"'Yes. She will be at your dance at Devon to-morrow night.'

"'Well, see here,' said the head. 'I'll have my coachman out in front of my gate at 9:30. Rush the girl off in town and marry her. I'll arrange with the clergyman for you.'

"'By Jove,' said the clerk, 'I'll do it!'

"And he did. The next night Dr. Davies performed the ceremony, and an hour or two later the millionaire found his daughter missing and was telegraphing in every direction to the young couple to come home and all would be forgiven."

An Unwelcome Innovation.

"So Lewis Waller is going to tour America! He'll make a hit here. He's so dashing."

The speaker, a New York manager, smiled and resumed:

"Waller will now be able to test the verisimilitude of his American stories. He has, you know, a host of them. One is about the mining town of Tin Can. According to Waller a tenderfoot entered Tin Can on an August day in white duck trousers. The residents at once surrounded him, bound him hand and foot and thrust him into the baggage car of a departing train.

"'Never,' said the mayor as the train drew forth—'never you come back here, pale face, under no consideration agin. We can stand biled shirts, but when it comes to biled trousers—wow!'"

Aldrich Law Must Be Amended.

The Aldrich tariff law has been in operation a little more than a month. Such limited time does not afford a thorough test of the law, but a thorough test is not necessary to convince most people of its ultimate results, so far as they are concerned. Since the law went into effect, some things have happened that are readily appreciated. Attention is called to some of them.

The iron and steel trade is regarded as the index of business. Pig iron has advanced $2 a ton, and steel is now quoted at $25. Neither at the mines nor in the mills have wages advanced a cent. Under impetus of the cotton schedule, New England manufacturers are enlarging old mills, and building new, but flatly refuse to restore the 10 per cent cut in wages made in March, 1908. The woolen industry is again active but wages remain where they have been for the last ten years, while clothing has advanced 10 to 20 per cent already. Hides are free, but shoe factories compromise with their employes, while shoes are higher than they ever have been. The beef trust finds occasion for advancing 3 cents a pound, while dairy products and eggs are higher than ever.

There is not now and never has been denial of the fact that the Aldrich law was framed by trusts and combinations. The charge was openly made on the floor of the Senate that certain schedules were drafted by the interests they affected. These charges were answered equivocably or evaded completely. The paid agents of special interests had easy access to the finance committee room, and constantly thronged the Senate corridors; the desires of the people expressed through letters to senators and communications to the press, got no farther than the waste basket, unless forced upon the Senate by "insurgent" members. The enactment of the law was celebrated only by its favored beneficiaries; the people were unconvinced, and are less so now.

Of course, the favored interests predicted resumption of industry. They had to do so, to be consistent. They had got what they asked for, and what enabled them again to operate their mills, factories and plants profitably to themselves. Secure in their positions, some of them became frank with the public, brutally frank, among them a prominent woolen manufacturer who said: "Protection? Why protection is wholly converted to profit before it reaches the employe." That statement supplied the key to the Aldrich law, opening wide the fact that from it the wage earner and the consumer have little to expect.

The only deduction permissable is that the Aldrich law favors the trusts, combinations and capital generally at the expense of the consumer. Railroads may order millions of dollars of rails and rolling stock; steel mills may work overtime to fill orders; cotton mills and shoe factories may hum; and woolen mills may run to full capacity, but if labor does not receive increased wage, or have the cost of living lowered, of what advantage to him is the Aldrich brand of protection? A tariff law that makes only a few men prosperous, cannot bring prosperity to all the people. When a few men prosper at the expense of the many, the law which enables them to do so stands in need of amendment.

From the Atlantic to the Pacific come expressions of dissatisfaction and discontent. At New Bedford 25,000 cotton operators threaten to strike for their promised 10 per cent restoration; in the great Western mines thousands more want to divide profits under the metal schedule. The demand is for better wages to meet the higher cost of living, or a lowering of prices. The people hold the Aldrich law responsible, and the Republican party will yet have to grant revision downward or permit the Democratic party to complete is unfinished task.—Williamsport (Pa.) Grit.

Tariff Tricks Exposed.

It will be remembered that during the last days of the recent tariff conference The Republic gave warning that in addition to several "jokers" then visible in the bill, numerous others would jump up like jack out o' the box as the "friends of the tariff" proceeded with their administration of the new law.

The first one came promptly in a ruling by the Treasury Department clapping a retaliatory tax of $2 a ton on print paper imported from the Canadian Provinces of Ontario and Quebec. This, in addition to the Payne-Aldrich rate of $3.75 a ton, raised the import tax on print paper to $5.75 a ton, which is only 25 cents less than the Dingley rate of $6. When the 25 per cent maximum is applied in April the rate will be 69 cents a ton higher than the Dingley rate. Does anybody wonder that this sort of "revision downward" threatens a trade war between the United States and Canada, certain to prove exceedingly costly to the people of both countries?

Another tariff trick has just been turned in a treasury ruling by which the tariff on trinkets consisting mainly of silver or cheaper metals is raised from the Dingley rate of 60 per cent to 85 per cent—an increase of more than one-third. By the same ruling, watch cases of the same metals are to be admitted at 40 per cent ad valorem, because they are not to be "worn upon the person" until they have been filled with works by the highly protected watch manufacturers of this country.

The Payne-Aldrich tariff is full of tricks of this sort which can be counted on to develop one after another, as the tariff machine is gradually brought into good working order under the new law. In the meantime the lemon growers of California, who got themselves protected in the Payne-Aldrich shuffle, have had their eyes opened by the advance of 15 cents on the hundred pounds in the freight rate on lemons to points in the middle West. The railroads get the bounty and the lemon growers "get the lemon."

So does everybody except the protected interests. The fraud is so palpable that President Taft deludes himself if he imagines that the Payne-Aldrich act has taken the tariff out of politics for three years, or even for three weeks. Already the cost of protected articles has advanced some 8 per cent, while advance in wages is next to nothing. Western Republicans are talking tariff more hotly than ever. The tariff will not slumber in the coming session of Congress. It will not slumber in popular discussion or in political campaigns until it ceases to be a scheme of plunder and rapine.—St. Louis Republic.

A Broken Pledge.

Some cynics affect to believe that political platfroms are only made to be broken. According to this view the party that can put the most vote-getting platitudes into its platform runs the best chance of deluding the people with false promises.

As a matter of history, the "downward" tariff revision pledge was written into the last year's Republican platform because political success was impossible without it. Neither the West, nor the middle West, could have been carried by the Republicans without this pledge of less tariff burdens for consumers.

In less than a year after his election we find the Republican President touring the West and making apologies for his party's failure to keep its platform pledges of "downward" revision. Mr. Taft frankly admits that under the most favorable construction the new tariff law only fulfills in spots his party's pledges. In other spots, like the woolen schedule, for instance, its pledges were broken.

Western voters are intelligent. They know the difference between ante-election promises and post-election apologies. The one carries hope with it, and the other nothing but Dead sea fruit. Average Western voters are more American than partisan.

That is why Republican campaign organizers are already scenting trouble throughout the West. And well they may. It is not the Democrats alone they will have to fight in the next campaign. Their own party has been split in twain by the failure of a Republican Congress to keep party pledges.

And in the West and middle West we will have the unique spectacle of Republican insurgents helping to elect Democratic Congressmen, not from choice but from patriotic duty.—Chicago Journal.

A Barren Tour.

There is an old legend about a Sphinx that finally consented to talk, and was promptly deposed as a popular idol as soon as the lack of wisdom became manifest in actual speech.

As a presidential Sphinx, Mr. Taft might have had more believers in his wisdom—not to speak of good faith—than will be counted in his favor at the end of his Western tour. His lame apologies for a robber tariff have not increased his political hold upon the Western people. Quite the reverse.

There is a vast difference between the homage and genuine enthusiasm with which Americans greet a President and the reception that these same intelligent Americans give to economic heresies. And it does not help the latter because they are uttered by a President. Not even Mr. Taft can paint a robber tariff to hide its true colors.

Doubtless President Taft was sincere in his belief that a "swing around the circle" would help him and his party politically. He began making political blunders before he had been twenty-four hours on his way. He took the role of special pleader for the Republican party's "solidarity." And to preserve the latter he publicly admitted that his tariff veto was withheld.

This is not good politics, even if literally true. Mr. Taft is speaking to audiences that believe in Americanism first and partyism second. He is voicing a futile plea for party loyalty by telling Western consumers they should accept a robber tariff to preserve the integrity of the Republican party.

As a White House Sphinx, Mr. Taft might have made better political headway. As a peripatetic tariff orator, he is doing great damage in the political china shop.

Tariff and Wages.

There was a time when American wage earners were asked to believe that employers are forced by an economic law to divide equitably with their employes the special profits resulting from high tariff.

In this way the Republican party always claimed to have a mortgage on a large share of the labor vote.

Even this wages argument is outworn and discredited wherever the tariff is intelligently discussed. The labor vote, in manufacturing centers, is no longer deliverable by high tariff politicians. Wage earners have discovered that more often wages go down under a robber tariff than up.

And the reason is simple. The high tariff overlords merely flood the country with European pauper labor when the wage scale goes too high to suit them. American workmen are given the alternative of accepting European standards of living or subjecting their families to idleness and starvation.

Worse than this, the price of life's necessities to the American workman and his family continues to mount under high tariff. He is caught between the upper and nether millstones. This explains the uncertain character of the labor vote, as compared with former party alignments.

And it is as certain as day that when real friends of the people are put in nomination for the next Congress, the nation's breadwinners will atone for past errors by scoffing at the old Republican campaign slogans.

The Redemption of David Corson

By CHARLES FREDERIC GOSS

CHAPTER X.—(Continued.)

Now that the confidence of Pepeeta had been secured, David's part in this drama became comparatively easy. He listened to the brief conversation in which by a well-constructed chain of fictitious reasonings the judge riveted upon the too eager mind of the child-wife the conclusion that she was free. When this arch villain had concluded his arguments every suspicion had vanished from her soul, and as he rose to depart she took him by the hand and bade him a kindly and almost affectionate farewell. "Do not afflict yourself with this painful memory," she said gently.

"I shall not need to afflict myself," he replied; "my memory will afflict me, for I am as guilty as if the result had been what I had expected; and if in the coming year you find a moment now and then in which you can lift up a prayer for a man who has forfeited his claim to mercy, I beg you to devote it to him who from the depths of his heart wished you joy. Good-bye."

With many assurances of her pardon, Pepeeta followed him to the door and bade him farewell. When she returned to David her face was luminous with happiness, and although he had begun already to experience a reaction and to suffer remorse for his successful infamy, it was only like a drop of poison in the ocean of his joy.

"Did I not tell you that all would be well?" she cried, approaching him and extending both her hands. "But how sudden and how strange it is. It is too good to be true. I cannot realize that I am free. I am like a little bird that hops about its cage, peeps through the door which its mistress' hand has opened, and knows not what to think. It wishes to go; but it is frightened. What shall it do, David? Tell it! Shall it fly?"

"I also am too bewildered to act and almost too bewildered to think," he said, with unaffected excitement and anxiety, for now that the time and opportunity for him to take so momentous a step had come, his heart failed him. It was only with the most violent effort and under a most pressing necessity that he pulled himself together and continued:

"The little bird must fly, and its mate must fly with it. There are too few hours before daylight and we must not lose a single one. But are you sure that you are quite ready? Is your mind made up? Will you go with me trustfully? Will you accept whatever the future has in store?"

She took his in her strong arms, printed her first kiss upon his lips, and said: "I will go with you to the ends of the earth! I will go with you through water and through fire! The future cannot bring me anything from which I shall shrink, if it lets us meet it hand in hand!"

Silently and swiftly they gathered together the few necessities of a sudden journey, stole out of the quiet building and hurried away to a livery stable. In a few moments they were rattling down the rough cobble-stone pavement to the river. The ferryman, who had been retained for this very purpose, pretended to be asleep. They aroused him, drove onto the platform of his primitive craft and floated out upon the stream. As the boat swung clear of the shore they heard music issuing from the cabin windows of a steamer under whose stern they were passing. It was the "Mary Ann." They listened. The music ceased for a moment and a deep voice called out "B-b-bravo! Another song!"

They recognized it instantly, and Pepeeta pressed close to the side of her lover.

"You hear it for the last time," he whispered.

The swift current seized the boat, twisting it hither and thither till it seemed to the now trembling fugitive a symbol of the stream of tendencies upon which he had launched the frail bark containing their united lives.

"I wonder if I am strong enough to stem it?" he asked himself, as the boat grated on the beach.

"Can we find a minister who will marry us at this time of night?" David said to the ferryman, although he had been careful to ask this question before.

"Two blocks south and three east, second door on the right hand side," he answered laconically, as he received the fare.

Such adventurers passed often through his hands and their ways were nothing new. The fugitives drove hurriedly to the designated house, knocked at the door, were admitted and in a few minutes the final act which sealed their fate had been performed.

CHAPTER XI.

When he awoke the next morning from a revel, the doctor crawled back to the hotel as best he could, his head throbbing with pain, his wits dull and his temper wild. Stumbling up the long flight of stairs which seemed to him to reach the sky, he burst open his door and entered the room. It was empty. Pepeeta was nowhere to be seen. It took him some moments to comprehend that he did not comprehend. Then he called, "Pepeeta! Pepeeta!"

The silence at first bewildered, then aroused him, and crossing the corridor he entered David's room. It, too, was empty. He was now thoroughly astonished and awake. Recrossing the hall he once more entered his room and began in earnest to seek an explanation of this mystery. It did not take him long, for on the table were lying the jewels in which he had invested his profits and which he had confided to Pepeeta—and beside them a piece of paper on which he slowly spelled out these startling words:

"I have discovered your treachery and fled. PEPEETA."

He drew his hand across his eyes, took a piece of his cheek between his thumb and first finger and pinched it to see if he were awake, then read the words again, this time aloud: "I have discovered your treachery and fled. Pepeeta." "Treachery?" he said. "What t-t-treachery? Whose t-t-treachery? Fled? Fled with whom, fled where? I wonder if I am still d-d-drunk?"

At last, and almost with the rapidity of a stroke of lightning, the whole mystery solved itself. It flashed upon his mind that Pepeeta had abandoned him, and in company with the man he had so implicitly trusted. The serpent he had nourished in his bosom had at last stung him! Tearing the paper into shreds, and stamping upon the floor, he cursed and raved.

A purpose shaped itself instantly in his mind, and he began its execution without delay. He made no confidant, took no advice; but having smoothed his ruffled clothing and combed his disheveled hair so as to excite no comment and provoke no question, he passed through the hotel corridor and office, greeting his acquaintances with his accustomed ease, and made his way to the livery stable. He went at once to the stalls where his famous team was accustomed to stand, and to his astonishment and delight found his horses both there.

"Tom," he said to the hostler, "did you hire a horse and b-b-buggy to a young couple last night?"

"I did not," answered the surly groom.

"I am in no mood for trifling. Out with it, you scoundrel!" he cried, seizing him by the throat.

With a sign of terror the groom indicated his readiness to come to terms, and the doctor relaxed his grip. Still trembling, he told the truth.

"Do you know which road they took?"

He waved his hand toward Kentucky.

"Put a saddle on Hamlet—no, on Romeo," he ordered, tersely.

The groom entered a box stall and let out the black beauty. The doctor glanced him over and smiled. And well he might, for every muscle, every motion betokened speed, intelligence, endurance.

The pursuer made a single stop on his way to the river and that was at a gun store, from which he emerged carrying a pair of saddle bags on his arm. In the holsters were two loaded pistols.

He smiled as he mounted, having already consummated vengeance in his heart. Once across the river and safe upon the Louisville pike, he loosened the reins. The horse, whose sympathetic heart had already been imbued with the spirit of his rider, shook his long black mane, plunged forward and pounded along the hard turnpike. His hoofbeats—sharp, sonorous, rhythmical—seemed to be crying for vengeance; for hoof-beats have a language, and always utter the thoughts of a rider.

The forests, hills and houses flowed past him like a river. Occasionally he halted an instant to inquire of some lonely traveler if he had seen a horse and buggy passing that way, but he was cunning enough to conceal his anxiety and to hide his joy as every answer made him more certain that he was on the trail of the fugitives.

The road was perfectly familiar. He had traversed it a hundred times, and not having to inquire the way he had only to remember and to reflect. An undercurrent of speculation had been flowing through his mind as to where he should overtake the fugitives.

For a mile or two the road was perfectly straight and the rider, shading his eyes, glanced along it. In the distance a moving object attracted his attention, and as he gazed at it, long and strainingly, the terrible smile once more wreathed his white lips. There were only two things present to his consciousness—the carriage upon which he was swiftly gaining, and the fierce smiting of the horse's hoofs which seemed to be echoing the the cries of his heart for vengeance. On he swept, nearer, nearer, nearer. He was now within hailing distance, and his brain reeled; he forgot his discretion and his plan.

"Halt," he screamed, in a voice that cut the silent air like a knife.

A face appeared above the top of the buggy, and looked back. It was his foe. With a howl of rage, he snatched a pistol from the holster and fired. The bullet went wide of the mark and the next instant he saw the whip-lash cut the air and descend on the flank of the startled mare. The buggy lurched forward, and for an instant drew rapidly away. Overwhelmed by the fear that he might be baffled in his vengeance, he drew the other pistol and fired again more wide of the mark than before.

He flung the smoking weapons into the road, and again drove the spurs into the steaming sides of his horse. There could be no doubt as to the result of the chase after that. The half-maddened animal was overhauling the fugitives perceptibly at every enormous stride, and in a few moments more shot by the buggy and up to the head of the terrified mare. As he did so, his rider reached out his left hand and caught the mare by her bridle, reined up his own horse and threw both of the animals back upon their haunches.

In another instant the two men stood confronting each other on the road, the quack black and terrible, the Quaker white and calm. Not a word was spoken, and like two wild beasts emerging from a jungle they sprang at each other's throats. They were oddly, but not unequally, matched, for while the doctor was short, thick-set and muscular, but clumsy and awkward like a bear, David was tall and slim, but lithe and sinewy as a panther. Locked in each other's arms, they seemed like a single hideous monster in some sort of convulsion. As it was impossible for them in this deadly embrace to strike, they wrestled rather than fought, and bit with teeth and tore with hands with equal ferocity.

At the instant when the two infuriated men seized each other in this deadly grip, Pepeeta fainted, while the terrified mare backed the buggy into the bushes by the roadside. Romeo, snorting and pawing the ground, snuffed at them a moment as is profoundly concerned at their strange maneuvers, then turning away, began to crop the rich blue grass in entire indifference to the results of this mad quarrel between two foolish men.

The combatants surged and swayed back and forth along the dusty road, tripping and stumbling in vain efforts to throw each other to the ground. Their danger lent them strength, and their hatred skill. At last, after protracted efforts, they fell and rolled over and over, now one on top, now the other. Suddenly and as if by a single impulse changing their tactics, their right hands unclasped and began to feel for the other's throat. A sudden slip of David's hold permitted the doctor to turn him over, and sprawling across his breast he pinioned him to the earth. His great hand stole toward the throat of his prostrate foe and fastened upon it with the grip of an iron vise.

The beautiful face turned pale, then grew purple. This would have been the last moment in the life of the Quaker had not his right hand, convulsively clawing the road, touched a piece of broken rock. It was as if a life-line had swung up against the hand of a drowning man. The exhausted youth untwisted the grip of the iron hand, flung off the heavy body, mounted upon it, crowded the great head with its matted hair and staring eyes down into the dust, seized the stone with his right hand, raised it, and struck.

The effect of the blow was two-fold—paralyzing the brain of the smitten and the arm of the smiter. Across the low forehead of the quack it left a great gaping wound like a bloody mouth. A death-like pallor spread itself over his countenance, the lids dropped back and left the eyes staring hideously up into the face above them.

David's arm, spasmodically uplifted for a second blow, was suspended in air. He did not move for a long time; and when at length his scattered senses began to return he threw down the stone, rose to his feet and exclaimed in accents of terror, "I have killed him."

He could not overcome the fascination of the lifeless face and wide-staring eyes. They drew him towards them; he stooped down and felt for the pulse, which was imperceptible; laid his hand upon the heart, but could not feel it beat; he raised an arm, and it fell back limp and lifeless.

Suddenly one elemental passion gave place to another. Horror had displaced anger, and now in its turn gave way to the instinct of self-preservation. He looked toward the carriage and saw that Pepeeta had fallen into a swoon. "Perhaps she has not seen what has happened," he said to himself, and a cunning smile lit up his pale face.

Stooping down, he seized the loathsome object lying there in the dust of the road and dragged it off into the thick shrubery. Stumbling along, he came to a hollow made by the roots of an upturned tree. Into this he flung the thing, hastily covered it with moss and leaves, and stood staring stupidly at the rude sepulchre. He experienced a momentary feeling of relief that the hideous object was out of sight; but the consciousness of his guilt and his danger soon surged back upon him like a flood. In such moments the mind works wildly, like a clock with a broken spring, but sometimes with an astonishing accuracy and wisdom.

(To be continued.)

"CRAZY DRAKE" FOUND OIL.

Fifty Years Ago Discoverer Was Laughing stock of Titusville.

Fifty years ago to-day Col. Edwin L. Drake discovered oil on the banks of Oil Creek at Titusville, Pa. To-day a host of people, many of them enriched beyond the dreams of Crœsus by his find, have gathered at Titusville and a celebration of the event will be crowned by a banquet, at which marvelous wealth will be represented, the New York Mail says.

The story of the finding of coal oil, which marked a new era in human affairs and made possible recent marvels in automobile and aeroplane propulsion, reads like a tale of Aladdin. Lumbermen of northwestern Pennsylvania had long known of the heavy, black, oily substance sweeping from the rocks in many localities. The "springs" were sought by Indians as cures ages before the coming of the white man, and the trappers and lumber jacks found it had wonderful healing qualities when bound on a wound. Millmen scooped it up to lubricate their machinery also.

Col. Drake was a poorly paid employe of the New Haven road at headquarters. A sample of oil reached him through Prof. Silliman of Yale, who suggested that Drake inspect the place whence the new substance came. He went to Oil Creek, backed by several men, and after walking about the hills studying the rocks and the oil which slowly percolated into shallow pits he conceived a plan to drill and find deposits of oil.

Drake could not hire well drillers. He could not find machinery. He had to invent it, and thus devised the only method ever used successfully, the familiar rocker beam and pipe casing in which the sucker rods work.

"Crazy Drake" was the laughing stock of the region. But persistence brought reward when oil was found and Drake knew it could be pumped in paying quantities.

It came too fast, in fact, for there were no tanks. Tight cooperage being necessary, Mrs. Drake traveled all over buying whisky barrels. Then an iron tank was built, but there was no market for the oil. No one wanted it. Of this period Mrs. Drake, who is still living in Philadelphia, says:

"At last Col. Drake persuaded the owner of a store in Titusville to place a row of lamps filled with the oil on his counter. The first night they were lighted the whole town came on the run, thinking the store was on fire, so bright a light did they give. You know in those days the sperm oil burned in lamps and wax and tallow candles gave a very poor light. And this discoverer of a new lighting material was as much a step forward as electricity was. We lighted our house a few lamps and again the people thought the house was on fire. After some months a slight sale began. Each household wanted at least one lamp. Petroleum sold then for $1 a gallon."

The news spread and the world knows the rest. In a short time refining experiments brought a stable product, "coal oil it was called or kerosene.

Suited Him.

"These summer girls would rather waltz than eat," remarked the hotel clerk.

"Think so?" inquired the proprietor.

"They say so themselves."

"Then I guess I'll add a waltz or two to the dance program and cut a couple of courses off the dinner bill."—Louisville Courier Journal.

The blessed work of helping the world forward happily does not wait to be done by perfect man.—George Eliot.

DOINGS OF WOMEN

Staying Youthful.

Whatever your age may be, begin now to think of yourself as in the dawn of new developments. Say to yourself many times a day that you possess more vital power, more mental force, more magnetism and charm than ever before in your life. Say also that you are better loved and more fully appreciated for all your virtues and charms than ever before, and that your ability to give and receive happiness is unlimited. Then use moments which you have been accustomed to idle away or to employ in melancholy thoughts, in improving yourself. Let this improvement be three-fold, until body and mind and spirit all radiate new brilliancy.

Give your mind new thoughts. Give your spirit new aspirations, and feed your brain with some new purpose. Keep up whatever accomplishments you possess; cultivate new ones. Begin at forty, fifty or sixty, even, to study languages and music and art. And instead or continually thinking about advancing age, think about increasing qualities and charms; instead of worrying over added years, rejoice over added occupations and means of enjoyment. Encourage the young to seek your society. Amuse and interest them, and this can only be done by keeping in sympathy with their ideas.

If you find your thoughts running along the line of criticism and disparaging comparisons of the young people of the day, with those of your own morning time, keep your ideas to yourself. Do not utter them.

Thumbscrews as Aid to Beauty.

In olden times thumbscrews were used to torture prisoners into confession, and thus gain from them secrets that only intense bodily pain would bring forth; but this, with many other fiendish means of torture, was left behind by advancing civilization. Now, however, it has made its appearance again, but as a means of self-inflicted torture, says Popular Mechanics. It is the newest aid-to-beauty fad of Europe, and its mission is to squeeze the tips of the fingers until they change from fat and pudgy to long and tapering.

Needlework Notes.

A sash of ciel blue satin would be neat on a girl's dress of ciel blue crepe de chine. Make the yoke and sleeves of tucked net.

Tinted embroidery can be cleaned by rubbing the surface with a piece of bread a day old. Use a small piece with the crust on and throw away as soon as soiled.

Cushion covers for bedroom chairs are plain, just back and front, of one colored cretonne, and put together with a simulated hem all around the edge. No frills.

To prevent embroidery on sheer materials from puckering baste tissue paper under the part to be embroidered. It will easily pull away when the work is finished.

Never neglect to moisten the linen that is to be drawn, with a damp rag or small sponge. The threads pull even more easily if the line to be pulled is rubbed with soap after being moistened.

It takes but a few moments to mark one's underclothing with embroidered initials, and these are always much prettier than anything that can be sewed on that it seems as if every girl who likes pretty lingerie would mark it in this way.

Changeable tones in chiffon find way among the fall dress materials which look rich over solid silk or satin foundations. These patterns are trimmed with rich trimmings of gold and embroidery.

Old newspaper wrappers make excellent rollers for centerpieces. They can be covered with a piece of white paper, which is easily removed when soiled. To each end paste pieces of tape long enough to hold the covers in position when on.

Advantages of the Short Girl.

The tall girl may be more imposing in appearance, more of a power at social functions, but the short girl does deadlier execution among men. From the first day they are at ease with her, which means a great deal to the average man; in her presence he does not feel the drawbacks of early incessant cigarette smoking, and the degeneracy of his sex; she can coax and pout, and flounce into pretty little passions with greater grace than a "daughter of the gods"; she needs a protecting arm in a crowd, and she does not take up so much room in a railway car, or dwarf her partners in the ballroom or while out for a walk.

There never yet was a little woman who could not flirt more furiously than a tall one, and yet escape unfavorable notice. Her scratches all seem to be given in play. It is, of course, by comparison that everything is thus or thus, and so it is only when judged by the standard of some exceptionally tall sister that a short woman will permit herself to be so described. She will always indignantly disclaim a brevity of inches under any circumstances, though no woman ever yet objected to the epithet "little woman" as a term of affection.

THREE STRIKING COSTUMES

Separate Apron Tunic. Coat in Russian Smock Style. Jersey Top Frock.

In many of the shops these graceful tunics may be bought, all ready to wear with any skirt that matches, sleeves and even stock and gaimpe being supplied to match. In this case tunic and skirt have been built at the same time and the material is a pale biscuit shade of permo fabric, the soft silky combination of mohair and worsted threads which is daintier for such costumes than an all wool material. The braiding is done in the same shade of material and the little yoke and stock are of dotted net in bise—or old lace color.

The Paris fad for everything Russian has brought forward all sorts of Russian habilaments. Tolstoy's peasant smock is much used for coat models and such a smock is suggested here, though this coat has been adapted to meet the longwaisted lines of the season. The fastening, at one side, is very Russian in character, and the fronts are cut double-breasted fashion, closing snugly about the throat. This coat is matched by a plaited skirt and both are of navy blue mohair.

The ultra expression of the moyen-age mode has been the jersey top dress, with a cuirass bodice reaching to the hip, and braided to imitate the ancient armor effect. This frock is of white silk cashmere, the bodice being of the supple woven silk fabric of which the embroidered silk gloves are fashioned. The braiding is done in white and the sash, which is tied around the hips, is of white satin messaline.

ABOUT THE BABY

"Too many fond parents give way to their impulse to pet the new baby," said a New York physician recently. "It is a mistake that often has fatal results and cannot be too strongly condemned. Of course, there is a reason for all things, and no physician would be so hard hearted as to deny to the parents all such expressions of affection, but handling of infants should nevertheless be sparingly indulged in. The child should be held gently and never jounced about or excited unduly.

"After feeding the little fellow should be laid on his right side or on his back. If laid on its left side the weight of the liver, which organ is proportionally very large in infants, rests on the stomach and sometimes distresses the child. Lay him down after his meal and do not disturb him, even if he cries to be petted.

"Indeed, parents weak minded enough to yield to the young tyrant's demands in that respect are laying up for themselves a large share of wrath to come. Let him have it out. In protracted cases selfwilled infants sometimes wake the echoes of a whole block for many hours, but the next time the struggle comes it won't last so long, and in time the child is trained to obedience in the matter of going to sleep. It takes strength of mind to follow this out at first, but it pays.

"Of course, the mother should always make sure when the child cries that there is really nothing the matter with him. If he stops crying as soon as picked up, it's a pretty good sign that he merely wants attention. Have no mercy in such a case, but leave him, in a separate room if possible, where he won't see any one moving about. He will soon learn what it means and will expect nothing different."

Position in Sweeping.

If a woman will stand up straight while she is sweeping it will prove the very best possible way of expanding her chest. But stooping over a broom is bad; the chest is contracted and the work made harder.

To sweep vigorously with head up and arms moving freely helps to give the shoulders a beautiful erectness and also pulls off superfluous flesh.

Especially where the arm is too fat directly below the shoulder this work helps. It takes off the extra flesh and rounds the arms splendidly. For this it is almost as good as using the washboard, and that is proverbial for improving the arms.

Mending Umbrellas.

Sometimes a person would like to change some expensive umbrella handle to another umbrella and fasten it on solid. This can be done by cleaning out the hole left in the handle from the old rod and filling the hole with powdered sulphur. Place the handle in a solid, upright position, and after heating the umbrella rod red hot push the rod down into the hole containing the sulphur. The hot rod fuses the sulphur, and when cold it will hold the rod solid. This method may be applied to fastening rods into stone, iron or wood.

Box for Bed Clothes.

Unused bed clothes should be carefully packed in dry goods boxes, but those boxes should be lined throughout with oilcloth, the right side of the oilcloth being tacked next to the wood. This keeps the box free from all dampness and bedding will always have a fresh, clean odor when not kept in a musty box in which dust can collect. Dampness causes valuable pieces to become musty. If bedding is packed in a box lined with lavender leaves one will never hesitate to take out a comfort, blanket or quilt for the guest's bed.

Strength of Human Hair.

A human hair of average thickness can support a load of 6¼ ounces, and the average number of hairs on the head is about 30,000. A woman's long hair has a total tensile strength of more than five tons, and this strength can be increased one-third by twisting the hair. The ancients made practical use of the strength of human hair. The cords of the Roman catapults were made of the hair of slaves, and it is recorded that the free women of Carthage offered their luxuriant tresses for the same use when their city was besieged by the Romans.

Here's an Ideal Husband.

An engineer on the Pennsylvania Railroad stopped his train to rescue a kitten that was asleep on the rails. If he isn't married we would recommend him unqualifiedly for a husband to the best sister we ever had.—Los Angeles Times.

Memories of the War

Holding Allatoona Pass.

When the writer is criticised for refusing to forget this 5th-day-of-October anniversary, his only excuse will be that this hobby was shot and trampled into him forty years ago, and for further reason that very little history of the War of the Rebellion has been written by private soldiers. We are sure of one to whom this effort brings satisfaction. So, what of it, if we stop on this fortieth anniversary to dwell reflectingly upon this great little event in our nation's life.

Do you know that forty years ago yesterday the eyes of the nation were upon Allatoona Pass, Georgia, garrisoned for the Union cause by less than 2,000 young men? Perhaps the destiny of a nation of 60,000,000 people depended on the courage, integrity, patroitism and fidelity of those boys.

There is a feeling that the old soldiers will tell any old yarn when they talk war stories, but this Oct. 5th anniversary is too serious to suggest anything that is not true. In the presence of the great little event which suggested the song, "Ho, My Comrades, See the Signal Waving in the Sky," in the presence of dead and dying comrades, we can afford to tell the truth only.

Oct. 5, 1864, suggests thoughts for memory and for tears.

It was during Abraham Lincoln's second campaign. The great problem whether 60,000,000 of people could govern themselves was on trial. The Union army under Sherman had captured Atlanta. The march to the sea had been planned. Sherman's army was at Kenesaw Mountain, near Atlanta. Allatoona Pass is eighteen miles north of Kenesaw. Here 2,000 Union soldiers guarded 2,000,000 rations for Sherman's army, about all that army had for the march from Atlanta to the sea. Six thousand Confederates, infantry and artillery, under General French, got in the rear of Sherman's main army and surrounded the Allatoona garrison. Under the flag of truce, French sent a message to General Corse in command of the Union forces, saying, that he would give the garrison five minutes in which to surrender "to save the necessary effusion of blood." Corse sent back word that the garrison was ready for that effusion as soon as his assailant chose to begin it. Then followed the greatest little battle of the century.

Aftr eight hours of the most desperate musketry and artillery duel on record, the rebels retreated. The boys in blue held the fort. The 2,000,000 rations and several thousand beef cattle were saved for Sherman's army. The battle was over, and the march to the sea could be made. For a little while quiet reigned; then a shout of triumph went up from the Allatoona hills. The wounded joined in the rejoicing. The dying looked up at the rent and riddled flag of the Union, still proudly floating over the fort, and thanked God that they had been able to keep it there.

The Union forces of less than 2,000 lost 713 men before the enemy was repulsed, over one-third of the number engaged. It was a dearly bought battle, but maybe it paid.

History tells us that the Confederates lost 1,500 killed and wounded, and they left 800 guns on the field.

All the field officers of the Union forces except four were either killed or wounded. Rank neither gave nor sought immunity from the burden of battle.

For hours not a command was heard. All that met our eyes was the rocky ridges that spoke with tongues of flame. It was one of the sublimest tragedies in history. The sun went down on an awful scene! Mutterings of thunder rolled through the valleys and gorges, and lightning flashed around the mountain. It was a fitting afterpiece to the tragedy of the day. Then Nature's tear drops fell in torrents as if to wash the red stain away.

The blood disappeared, but the scars remained, though most of them have long since been hidden under a friendly sod in the land they helped to make free. It was an awful night.

Flashes of lightning cast lurid light upon many scenes of horror! And so the long dreary night wore away. The wounded received as much care as it was possible to give them. The dead were buried.

Gathered together by companies and regiments, wrapped in blankets, they lay side by side near the long shallow grave in the breast of the mountain.

The roar of the battle had been exchanged for silence! Men whose voices had shouted in defiance to the enemy, now spoke in whispers, or stood silent. Hearts that had stood unmoved through all that storm could not withstand the power of that scene of blood and suffering and death. Throbbing, they yielded and melted to tears.

It was a dearly bought victory; but it was a great stake. Sherman's army of 60,000 men, or more, had struggled, marched and fought, day and night, for five months, and had achieved a victory in the capture of Atlanta, of immense value to the Union cause. The enemy now sought to convert that victory into defeat in a single day. The loss of Allatoona to the Union forces would have been a terrible disaster.

The boys who bore the old flag to victory that day had the backbone to remain loyal to their trust. They were boys who would "take a message to Garcia." They sent a message back to the Union that cheered freedom's cause throughout the world.

Of the boys who held Allatoona Pass there are only a few left to tell the story of the day's work on Oct. 5, 1864, which suggested the gospel hymn, "Hold the Fort, for I Am Coming."

General Sherman made this battle an occasion for an order, in which he said, among other things, "The thanks of this army are due and are hereby accorded the officers and men for the determined gallant defense of Allatoona, and it is made an example to illustrate the importance of preparing in time and meeting danger boldly, manfully, and well."—J. F. Crawe, in Bremer County Independent (Waverly, Iowa), Oct. 6, 1904.

With McCook at Chickamauga.

The recent death of General Edward McCook, former Governor of Colorado, recalls the story of his gallantry at Chickamauga on September 19 and 20, 1863.

By Chickamauga's crooked stream the martial trumpets blew;
The North and South stood face to face, with war's dread work to do.
Oh, lion strong, unselfish, brave, twin athletes battle-wise,
Brothers, yet enemies, the fire of conflict in their eyes,
All banner-led and bugle-stirred, they set them to the fight.
Hearing the God of slaughter laugh from mountain height to height.

The ruddy, fair-haired giant North breathed loud and strove amain;
The swarthy shoulders of the South did heave them to the strain;
An earthquake shuddered underfoot, a cloud rolled overhead,
And serpent tongues of flame cut through and lapped and twinkled red,
Where back and forth a bullet-stream went singing like a breeze,
What time the snarling cannon-balls to splinters tore the trees.

"Make way, make way!" a voice boomed out, "I'm marching to the sea!"
The answer was the rebel yell and Bragg's artillery.
Where Negley struck, the cohorts gray, like snow-tossed clouds, were rent;
Where Buckner charged, a cyclone fell, the blue to tatters went;
The noble Brannan cheered his men, Pat Cleburn answered back,
And Lytle stormed, and life was naught in Walthall's bloody track.

Old Taylor's ridge rocked to its base, and Pigeon mountain shook;
And Helm went down, and Lytle died, and broken was McCook.
Van Cleeve moved like a hurricane, a tempest blew with Hood,
Awful the sweep of Breckenridge across the flaming wood.
Never before did battle-roar such chords of thunder make,
Never again shall tides of men over such barriers break.

"Stand fast, stand fast!" cried Rosecrans, and Thomas said, "I will!"
And crash on crash his batteries dash their broadsides down the hill,
Brave Longstreet's splendid rush tore through whatever barred its track.
Till the "Rock of Chickamauga" hurled the roaring columns back,
And gave the tide of victory a red tinge of defeat,
Adding a noble dignity to that hard word, retreat.

Two days they fought and evermore those days shall stand apart,
Keynotes of epic chivalry within the nation's heart.
Come, come, and set the carven rocks to mark this glorious spot,
Here let the deeds of heroes live, their hatreds be forgot.
Build, build, but never monument of stone shall last as long
As an old soldier's ballad borne on the breath of battle-song.
—Maurice Thompson.

Meum et Tuum.

It was strange how little regard the soldiers of the late war had for the above motto. My regiment, the Twenty-fifth Michigan Infantry, had the reputation of being the most honest and upright of any that went down to Dixie, but I know the boys never suffered anything to lie around loose that could possibly be used. In the fall of 1862 we were encamped near Louisville, Ky., and had for neighbors two regiments of Indiana boys. One night some of our boys went out and confiscated two stands of bees. They were detected in the act and closely followed into camp, but strange as it may appear, when the pursuers reached our camp guard they left the trail, which was perfectly plain, and passed on to the camp of the Hoosiers, saying they knew the Michigan boys never stole but always bought what they wanted. In December, 1862, we were lying in camp at Munfordsville, Kentucky, and while out scouting, and about two miles from camp, one of the boys stole a grindstone and carried it into camp. On his arrival at camp I asked him what he stole that for.

"Oh," said he, "it will come handy to sharpen our knives on."

"Do you think you will get transportation for grindstones when we march?" I asked.

To which he replied: "I should not be surprised if we stayed in this camp until we muster out."

He was terribly disappointed when a few days after we received marching orders, and his grindstone was the butt for a joke whenever any of our knives wanted sharpening.

Not Afraid.

Personal courage invests its owner with a protection beyond that afforded by outside forces. An illustration of this is recorded by General William F. Draper in his "Recollections of a Varied Career," where he gives this incident:

"In 1864 Colonel Daniels of the Seventh Rhode Island became unpopular with some of his command, and a rumor spread that he would be shot at the next engagement. He heard of it.

"It was customary when guns had been loaded for some time to have them discharged into some convenient bank, and Colonel Daniels took advantage of this. Marching his regiment out with loaded rifles, he faced them toward a suitable elevation, and taking position on the top of it, and in front of them, as at dress parade, he gave the commands, 'Ready, Aim, Fire,' and the pieces were discharged.

"Needless to say, any man could have shot him with little danger of discovery, and needless to say, also, none of them did. There were no more threats of that kind in his regiment."

Does Not Stimulate

Ayer's Sarsaparilla does not stimulate. It does not make you feel better one day, then as bad as ever the next. It is not a strong drink. No reaction after you stop using it. There is not a drop of alcohol in it. You have the steady, even gain that comes from a strong tonic and alterative. We wish you would ask your doctor about this. He knows. Trust him. Do as he says. J. C. Ayer Co., Lowell, Mass.

What are Ayer's Pills? Liver Pills. How long have they been sold? Nearly sixty years. Do doctors recommend them? Ask your own doctor and find out.

Indiana Cattle Feeders' Meeting

The third annual meeting of the Indiana Cattle Feeders' Association is called by President C. W. Brackney to meet in the Agricultral Building at Purdue University, Lafayette, Indiana, at 9:30 a. m., Friday, November 19, 1909. The Live Stock Breeders' Association and the Animal Husbandry Department of Purdue will co-operate with the Cattle Feeders in making this the best meeting ever held in the state.

An exceptionally good program has been arranged which will inlcude an address by Prof. C. F. Curtiss, of Ames, Iowa, on "Beef Cattle." A judging demonstration will be conducted in which the Show Herd of Prize Winning Steers will be used. A visit of inspection will be made to the experimental feed lots where 100 head of steers just starting into the Winter Feeding Experiments will be valued by commision men from Chicago and Indinapolis, who will give their opinions of the beef cattle market for the winter.

A summary of the results secured during the past five years of experimental steer feeding at Purdue will be given by W. A. Cochel of the Animal Husbandry Department. This will cover a laage range of subjects including the value of clover hay, timothy hay, corn silage, corn stover, cottonseed meal and linseed meal for fattening purposes, the influence of age on the rate and cost of gain and profits secured from feeding, and the relative merits of short vs. long feeding periods.

Every one who is interested in the Feeding of Beef Cattle should arrange to be present. A program will be mailed upon application to

The Twilight of Life

The muscles of the stomach in old age are not as strong or active as in youth and in consequence old people are very subject to constipation and indigestion. Many seldom have a bowel movement without artificial aid. Many, also, have unpleasant eructations of gas from the stomach after eating. All this can be avoided by the use of Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin, which permanently regulates the bowels so that passages come naturally, and so strengthens the stomach that food is digested without discomfort. It is absolutely guaranteed to do what is claimed, and if you want to try it before buying, send your address for a free sample bottle to Pepsin Syrup Co., 119 Caldwell Bldg., Monticello, Ill. It is sold by all druggists at 50c and $1 a bottle. 44-1m

Doan's Kidney Pills never fail you.
Butler people know this.
Read this Butler case.
Read how Doan's stood the test.
For many years
It's local testimony and can be investigated:

Mrs. C. R. Abrams, N. Pearl Street, Butler, Ind., says: "I have nothing but words of praise for Doan's Kidney Pills as they have always given very satisfactory results in my case. For years I suffered from severe attacks of backache and pains in my kidneys, sometimes extending as far as my shoulders. The kidney secretions were very irregular in passage and caused me much annoyance. After I had tried several remedies without success, I procured Doan's Kidney Pills at Stone's drug store and they brought me relief. In July 1902, I gave a statement for publication endorsing this preparation and at the present time, I gladly confirm what I then said: I have used Doan's Kidney Pills several times during the past two years when a cold has brought on a return of backache and I have never failed to receive the desired relief."

How to Preserve a Husband

Be careful in your selection—do not choose too young, and take only such as have been raised in good moral atmosphere. When once selected and decided upon let them remain for ever settled and give your entire thought to preparation for domestic use. Some insist on keeping them in pickle while others are constantly getting them into hot water; this only makes them sour hard and sometimes bitter. Even poor varieties may be made sweet, tender and good by garnishing them with patience well sweetened with smiles and flavored with kisses to taste, then wrap him in a mantle of charity, keep warm with a steady fire of domestic devotion and serve with peaches and cream. When thus prepared they will keep for years.

We believe there would be more frugality in the homes if men would give their wives a reasonable amount of money for household expenses, and let them have all they can save out of it for their own use; and men too, would be better off than in the unmethodical and haphazard way in which most homes are run. Women would be more apt to study kitchen economy if they could see a reward ahead. A nation of thrifty men cannot be born of thriftless mothers. Women have need to know more of business, and think more of means to ends than is usual among them.

THE GOOD CITIZEN

"Wet" or "Dry"

Mr Editor:—

There is nothing more desirable for DeKalb county in both Rural and City Districts than a good citizen. The good citizen is admired by all, he at once becomes a model by which the life and character of the younger generation is fashioned; and, therefore is useful to all. The good citizen, therefore, is a standard by which life and character is regulated, and holds a position which is both delicate and profound.

The good citizen, in his relation to human life, should be like the magnetic needle in its relation to the pole; he should always direct his thoughts and aspirations toward the highest point, of ideal, in human life, nor should he waver from his position when threatened with impending danger or calamity. There is an inspiration for him in the very fact that he is able to assume a high standard, and that he is able to retain his position no matter how the elements around him may howl.

Now the standard of good citizenship is to be found in the exercise of four qualities of human life that ring out above the mart of our busy life, and which at once classify the citizen as good or bad; these are the Lawabiding, the Sanatory, the Economic, and the Moral. The test of loyalty is to be found in remaining faithful to these fundamental elements no matter what the situation or condition in life may happen to be.

And now, in the coming local option election, a test will be found by which to classify the majority of DeKalb county's citizens. Are they good or bad citizens? This is the question that will be answered at the poles on the 27th instant. And, to determine this, the time is past for sentimental expression; there is need for practical exposition by which a correct mental attitude may be developed and maintained.

LAW ABIDING

No one will question the fact that a good citizen is a law abiding citizen. This fact is too evident to demand any words for proof. But the good citizen will not only be law-abiding, but he will merge his energy into the glorious effort to prevent lawlessness in his city or community. He will make every attempt needful to preserve peace and tranquility. He not only needs to punish the person who has transgressed the law, but he must protect his fellowman from the net that is laid open to entice, and from which he has the power to save him. And if a person fails to do this he cannot be called a good citizen. When, then, the good citizen faces a pending proposition such as the continued expulsion of the saloon, or the reinstatement of that enemy of law and order, he cannot but cast his lot with the former. The time has passed for leniency on this subject; every right minded person must acknowledge that the saloon is an enemy of the law, and of order, and hence, an enemy of the best interests of human society. Not only is the saloonkeeper not law abiding, but, also, his patron. Every time a man patronizes such a place under cover he is as much a criminal as the man who made it possible for him to break a link in the legal code. Both are liable to arrest. Both would be arrested, were the law enforced. And, therefore, knowing the past history of lawlessness of the saloons, and of many of their patrons, and the danger of as much or more such lawlessness in the future, should the saloon return, every good citizen will do right only by raising his voice in protest, and in casting his vote against it. To be a good citizen one will have to prevent the reinstatement of this enemy of law and order, and of human society.

SANATORY

The good citizen is sanatory. He has a horror for anything that smacks of dirt and slime and filth. He has his eyes open for any new plan or invention that will reduce unsanatory conditions in his own home, in his own city, and in the homes of his fellowmen. "No man liveth unto himself." He cannot sit amid cleanliness and allow his fellowman to wallow in the dirt, when he is able to raise his neighbor to a higher state of cleanness by a simple act of silent consent at the polls. We state, "at the polls" for the reason that a right act at the polls in the coming election means the prevention of much unsanatory influence if the saloons are kept away. Who has not seen the dirt and filth that is evident in the best regulated saloon, as well as the very unhealthful condition existing around the homes where men and women are patrons of the archfriend of dirt and slime and filth? The street, the person, the home, every aspect of human life reassumes an appearance of dirt and slime and filth simultaneously with the return of the saloon. And this the good citizen will prevent if he will carry out the higher instincts of good citizen.

ECONOMIC

The good citizen is a practical economist In private and public affairs he has a thought for the economic conditions of life. Not only are his own affairs of interest to him but also the affairs of his neighbors. And wherever he is able to ameliorate the hard conditions of his fellowmen in this particular sense he is at once ready to land effective assistance. And now men of DeKalb county let us indulge a practical instance: A young man with too much good in him to be a victim of the institution that makes financial wrecks of men, gave me a story of his life this summer that demands the attention of every man who claims to be a citizen. During this last summer he claims he saved the first money of his life, started his first bank account, was for the first time able to buy what his family needed and pay for it, and was the first time in his life, that he knew what it was to husband and father in his home. "My wife and babe and I are happy, and the absence of the saloon is the cause for our happiness." he concluded. This is only one instance of the thousands we might quote. And tell me, men of DeKalb county, are you not glad that our votes were instrumental in bringing about these economic conditions in this home and in many others, and that you have helped to make some other person acquainted with the real comforts of life? The good citizen will have this instinct to do good; the bad citizen will desire the return of saloon so that homes may be wrecked.

MORAL

Moral integrity is the root of human felicity. If all were moral all would be safe. The saloon, the red light district, the brothel, the police, the court, all would be abolished were all moral. But immorality may be held at bay by the exercise of proper influence and effort on the part of the good citizen. And since the liquor traffic is the root of all the damnable indulgences of sociesy the good citizen will not tolerate its return. Some one may say that the moral conditions of the county are better today than they were when the saloon was here; but here is where we make a great mistake. On investigation we are convinced that the moral atmosphere is considerably renovated. This fact we acquire by contact with the individual. Many men have told us that they are not tortured with the harrowings of passion today as they were when inveterate tipplers, and women tell of changed conditions in the home. We concede that some men become intoxicated sometimes, but the mean average is largely in favor of the abandoned saloon. And the men who do become intoxicated sometimes are the ones who live in the lower moral atmosphere. That the absence of the saloon is conducive to a better moral atsmosphere is so infallably true that the right thinking person simply cannot deny it with impunity. And the better the moral atmosphere the better the society, the home, the individual, the business interests and the collective peace and happiness of men.

Here, then, we have the facts that tell, and which will classify the good citizens of the county. And when the election returns are made public property let it be said of the men of DeKalb county, that they are law-abiding sanatory, economic, moral—that they are good citizens.

WHEN you are ready to do any painting, do a little figuring; here's an example.

If painting costs two or three times as much as the paint and one paint goes two or three times as far as another, how much are those two paints worth?

The one paint is Devoe Lead-and-Zinc; goes farther, takes fewer gallons, lasts longer than other paint; there are a lot of others.

WHY SALVES FAIL TO CURE ECZEMA

They Clog the Pores—Only a Liquid Can Reach the Inner Skin

Since the old fashioned theory of curing eczema through the blood has been given up by scientists, many different salves have been tried for skin diseases. But it has been found that these salves only clog the pores and can not penetrate to the inner skin below the epidermis where the eczema germs are lodged.

This—the quality of penetrating—probably explains the tremendous success of the only standard liquid eczema cure, oil of wintergreen as compounded in D. D. D. Prescription. After ten years of cure after cure, the world's leading skin specialists have accepted this as the true eczema cure.

We ourselves do not hesitate to recommend D. D. D. Prescription at at $1.00 a bottle, but for the benefit of those who have never tried the prescription, we arranged with the D. D. D. Laboratories of Chicago for a special large trial bottle at 25 cents on a special offer now. This first bottle ought to convince every sufferer, and at any rate, it will surely take away the itch at once. S. G. Stone, Druggist, Butler, Ind.

The second number of the lecture course which was a lecture by Charles Howard Plattenburg, was held at the opera house Tuesday evening, and was largely attended. The subject used by Mr. Plattenburg was "Worms Beneath the Bark." There was much wit and wisdom in his lecture, and was well received by his auditors. The next number is the Appallo Quintette and Bell Ringers, Dec. 11th. This will be one of the strongest numbers of the course. Do not miss it.

Class No. 9 of the U. B. Sunday school met Tuesday evening with Mr. and Mrs. Russell Young. The business part of the class was in charge of Mrs. Stage, their president. "Temperance" was the main subject and also held the most prominent place, it being used as the motto. A temperance song, "Away, Away, the Bowl" was rendered by Mr. and Mrs. Showalter and Bechtel. An old fashioned spelling school was engaged in, using Bible characters instead of words. This proved very entertaining and also instructive. The hostess served a dainty lunch which all enjoyed, thirty-seven being present.

The cause of the fire alarm which was sent in Sunday evening was a live wire in the east part of town. The insulation had become worn off and the wire which it had burnt into was sending up quite a blaze. The city electrician was notified and the wire was cut and the damage and excitement soon over. Closely following this, however, a fuse in the west part of the city burnt out and caused the lights in the Disciple church, where a union temperance meeting was being held, to go out. By this time the church people began to think it was the works of the saloon element trying to break up the meeting, and considerable indignation was noticeable on the part of the leaders, while the more conservative kept quiet. Again the electrician was called, but was not able to discover what was causing the trouble until the next morning when he made an investigation and furnished us with the information that it was all purely accidental.

F. M. Wiltrout, of Corunna, has been granted a patent on a portable concrete tile mold. Wiltrout was formerly connected with the Raber-Lang Manufacturing Co., of Kendallville. His invention is said to be one of the best on the market.

January 1st will soon be here and the HERALD will need some money at that time very badly and we wish to make a special request of out delinquent subscribers to come in on or before that time and pay for the paper which they have been reading and enjoying. The law says we shall not send the paper after it has become delinquent one year, therefore we must insist that our friends keep paid up.

Wm. H. McIntosh, of Auburn, has kindly consented to contribute an article to the Herald on "Butler Schools and Scholars of 1869." to appear in the early part of next month. Timely notice is given so that those who attended this school at that time may have an opportunity of securing a copy of the paper containing the write-up. This article will be of general interest and well worthy of notice.

"Sensationalism at its worst is a blotch on the American newspaper, but the crisis seems to have been passed and even the scandal monger type is showing signs of reformation. Turning from sensationalism the fidelity of modern journalism is a matter with which few are familiar. The care exercised by the self-respecting newspaper to keep out improper news, unfair personalities, unwarranted inferences and libelous reports is little understood and little appreciated. News is not taken on hearsay. Mere report is always verified if the newspaper is self respecting and it usually is."—Exchange.

It is amusing to watch the average boy start in to learn his trade. One week's work and he knows he will make a success. At the end of the second week he graduates. Another week and he knows more about the business than his employer and makes up his mind to have things run to suit him. Then by the middle of the next week he is loafing the streets, by invitation, and telling people how ignorant and how foolish that fellow is who owns that store, shop, or office down the street. Do such boys ever earn a dollar's worth of property? Hardly—Exchange.

Store Talk

For Your Sake

As well as ours we ask you to keep posted on the offerings of this store. The Dress Goods, Silks, Ladies' Suits, Coats, Furs, Shoes, Clothing and all other departments are very inviting in their display of all that is new and stylish in merchandise for winter. Qualities that are right, styles that are the latest, prices that will please.

Hosiery and Underwear

In all earnestness we say to you that now is a good time to lay in a supply of hosiery and underwear and underwear for your entire family. Such qualities and values as we offer now will not possible another season.

It has always been our aim to have this department a trade winner. Merchandise that fits, wears and is reasonable in price is the great difficulty in this class of goods.

Whether it's hosiery or underwear, you are uncomfortable if you are not perfectly fitted; and you are dissatisfied unless you get good value for your money.

We have studied both these problems in connection with this department and we feel that we have the best fitting and the best wearing lines to be had in the country. Whether it is for yourself or your children we know we can please you.

Notions and Novelties

Whether it's a smallest item to be found in a Dry Goods Store, say a paper of pins, or the most elegant or elaborate novelty in the nature of a belt, bags, veil or some jewelry ornament, we want you to feel that you will find it right here. We have always paid much attention to our notion section, feeling that it is as much our duty to render good service and please you in the sale of these small items as it is when the article you want may run well up into the dollars. Give us an opportunity to prove this—

CURED ITCHING HUMOR.

Big, Painful Swellings Broke and Did Not Heal—Suffered Three Years—Tortures Yield to Cuticura.

"Little black swellings were scattered over my face and neck and they would leave little black scars that would itch so I couldn't keep from scratching them. Larger swellings would appear and my clothes would stick to the sores. I went to a doctor, but the trouble only got worse. By this time it was all over my arms and the upper part of my body in swellings as large as a dollar. It was so painful that I could not bear to lie on my back. The second doctor stopped the swellings, but when they broke the places would not heal. I bought a set of the Cuticura Remedies and in less than a week some of the places were nearly well. I continued until I had used three sets, and now I am sound and well. The disease lasted three years. O. L. Wilson, Puryear, Tenn., Feb. 8, 1908."

A Poor Memory for Names.

The teacher was trying to explain the word "transfiguration." "Don't you remember the transfiguration on the mount?" she said. "Who was it who was transfigured and changed in appearance on that occasion?" she asked hopefully. After a moment of thoughtful silence, Barker hesitatingly raised his hand.

"I can't just remember his name," he said, "but he was up there hunting and he went to sleep and slept twenty years."—Success Magazine.

Passing of the Hostess.

The decay of the fine art of entertaining is much bemoaned by a London paper. Once no woman would think of entertaining at any place but in her own home. Now she goes to a restaurant to save the trouble in the home. Moreover, there was a time when the hostess prided herself on her own conversational powers and upon her ability to draw out her guests, who were generally chosen with regard to some ability in this direction. Now nobody talks, but somebody sings or plays and the concert or rhetorical entertainment has taken the place of brilliant conversation.

HUNDREDS of MILLIONS required to rebuild SOLOMON'S TEMPLE

MASONIC ORDER CREDITED WITH PLAN TO RESTORE THE SPLENDID EDIFICE BUILT BY THE FIRST GRAND MASTER—FACTS AND FIGURES WHICH SHOW THAT THE COST OF SUCH AN UNDERTAKING WOULD "STAGGER HUMANITY."

It is expected that Arthur B. Howe, president; former Congressman L. D. Apsley, Bishop John W. Hamilton, Warren B. Ellis, W. E. Litchfield and Adjutant General William H. Brigham and twenty Massachusetts Freemasons who organized a corporation to receive the project of building a replica of the ancient temple of Solomon at Jerusalem, the birthplace of Freemansonry, will begin the work within a year, writes a Boston correspondent. The project, which originated with Mr. Howe, after a pilgrimage to the great eastern mecca of all Masons, is intended to embrace subscriptions of $5 from each of the 15,000 Blue lodges throughout the United States. The original temple is to be duplicated in this costly model.

The restoration of Solomon's temple itself would necessitate first the wrecking of all the buildings comprising the Haramesh-Sherif, but the cost of this labor need hardly be reckoned, since the salvage would be worth an enormous fortune to the vender of curios, to say nothing of the valuable building material that could be used in the new structures or converted into cash. Whether it would be possible to rebuild the actual temple as Solomon built it is a mooted question.

Description in the Bible.

The sixth chapter of first Kings says:

"And the house, when it was in building, was built of stone made ready before it was brought thither; so that there was neither hammer nor ax nor any tool of iron heard in the house while it was in building. And he built the walls of the house within with boards of cedar, both the floor of the house and the walls of the ceiling, and the cedar of the house was carved with knops and open flowers. All was cedar; there was no stone seen." A little farther it reads: "So Solomon overlaid the house within with pure gold, and he made a partition by the chains of gold before the oracle."

In the next paragraph is the statement: "And the whole house he overlaid with gold, until he had finished all the house." There is a lengthy description of the elaborate carving in olive wood that adorned every conceivable part of the building, and then the assertion, following the description of cherubim and palm trees and flowers, "And covered them with gold fitted upon the carved work."

Had Cedars of Lebanon.

On some points the biblical account is wonderfully direct and explicit. It is known exactly how many common laborers were employed in the hewing of timbers, how many foremen directed their work, and what price was paid for the materials that could not be obtained in the forests and quarries near Jerusalem. Solomon had one advantage that would not in all probability be enjoyed by the masons who attempt a reproduction of the stupendous work, especially if they encounter the bitter opposition from the present incumbents of Mount Moriah that the world anticipates. Solomon was on terms of intimacy with Hiram, King of Tyre, whose mountains were covered with such cedar and fir trees as are not to be found there to-day.

KING SOLOMON'S TEMPLE WHICH THE MASONS PROPOSE TO REPRODUCE.

These were the famous cedars of Lebanon, and the most skilled hewers of timber in Solomon's time were the Sidonians, Hiram's subjects. The building materials were prepared at what was then regarded as a very great distance, conveyed from the mountain sides to the sea and sent down to the port nearest Jerusalem in "flats," and then hauled overland about forty miles.

Until competent architects take the matter in hand any estimate of the cost of rebuilding Solomon's temple must be little better than a mere guess, but certain calculations based on the biblical account will show, at least, that an incredible sum would be required. Take, for the purposes of illustration, the single item of the primary material for the temple, the stone and wood, cutting, dressing and transporting to the site in Jerusalem.

Solomon made a deal with King Hiram to supply the timber and to furnish a number of his own subjects to help cut down the trees, "for the Sidonians are more skillful than our people in cutting of wood." For the services of these expert woodcutters and for the cedar and cypress timber they felled Solomon paid Hiram 20,000 measures of wheat, 20,000 measures of barley, and 20,000 baths each of wine and oil annually. The quantity of wheat and barley was each equivalent to 200,000 bushels, and the 20,000 baths of oil and wine was each equivalent to 100,000 gallons. A rough estimate of the value of these payments at present prices would be:

Wheat	$200,000
Barley	100,000
Olive oil	240,000
Wine	160,000
Total per annum	$700,000

For the three years occupied in getting out the timber this would amount to $2,100,000.

163,300 Men Employed.

But Solomon added to the force of Sidonian woodcutters 30,000 men of his own to work in shifts of 10,000, each shift one month in the forests and two months at home, alternately. He also set 80,000 stonecutters to work in the mountains, quarrying and dressing the stone for the temple, and another force of 70,000 men to serve as burden bearers, carrying the stone and timber to Jerusalem. Over these workmen were 3,300 foremen. There were, therefore, 163,300 men employed for three years in the preparation of the building materials for the construction of the temple and in transporting them to the site.

While, as a matter of course, no such numbers of men would be required at the present day, it is interesting to calculate the cost of these levies if paid in United States money at the minimum wages of to-day. Let it be supposed that the timber cutters and burden bearers were paid at the rate of $1 per day, the stone cutters $2 per day, and the foremen $3 per day, wages which the American laborer would sniff at. This would make the wage bill for the 10,000 woodcutters:

Weekly	$ 60,000
Yearly	3,120,000
Three years	9,360,000

Wage Bill $236,006,400.

The wage bill of the 70,000 burden bearers would be:

Weekly	$ 420,000
Yearly	21,840,000
Three years	65,520,000

The wages of the 80,000 stonecutters at $2 a day would aggregate:

Weekly	$ 960,000
Yearly	49,920,000
Three years	149,760,000

The 3,300 foremen would be paid:

Weekly	$ 59,400
Yearly	3,088,800
Three years	9,266,400

Recapitulation:

Total for timber cutters	$ 9,360,000
Total for burden bearers	65,520,000
Total for stonecutters	149,760,000
Total for foremen	9,266,400
Total paid Hiram	2,100,000
Grand total	$236,006,400

And all this before a stone could be laid in the temple. Of course, such figures as these are no definite value in estimating the cost of rebuilding Solomon's temple, but they help one to a conception of the immensity of that task.

Solomon was seven years building the temple. The quantity of gold used on the Most Holy House—the Oracle—is said in Chronicles to have been 600 talents.

If the same system was adopted in the outer part 2,700 talents must have been required. It is not known whether the "heavy" talent or the "light" talent is referred to in the biblical narrative, and as one is twice the weight of the other it makes a considerable difference. The Encyclopedia Britannica gives the weight of the Babylonian "heavy" talent as 936,000 grains.

Ornaments and Gems, Too.

The United States dollar contains, approximately, twenty-five grains, which would make the value of the "heavy" talent in our money $37,400. On this basis the gold used in the Oracle was worth $22,440,000, and that in the other part of the temple $100,980,000, or a total of $123,420,000. If the "light" talent is referred to, the value of the gold would be just half that, or $61,710,000.

This does not take into consideration the value of the gold used in the golden ornaments, including the great candlestick and the thousands of gold utensils necessary to the temple worship. According to Josephus, whose statements are, however, believed to be very much exaggerated, there were 100,000 golden vessels, 80,000 golden dishes for offering fine flour, 60,000 large gold basins for flour and oil, 20,000 measures of gold, and the same number of golden censers. Nor does this statement include the great number of precious gems which are said to have been used in the decoration of the temple, and which some authorities believe equal the gold in value.

But all this is enough to show that to reproduce Solomon's temple on the same scale and with the same magnificence would cost some hundreds of millions of dollars and would make a very large hole in the world's stock of gold.

RAILROAD SLEUTH BUSY

Detective for the Big Lines Is Forced to Deal With Many Kinds of Robbers.

HIS OFFICE IS AN ARSENAL.

Thieves Not Particular About What They Steal—John J. Risdon Keeps Track of Criminals.

He was a big, florid man, glorying in a girth of Taftlike proportions and when he bustled into the room, showing a sea-roll stride, he was blowing like a porpoise. Also perspiring, as becomes a ponderous person on a warm day. Stretching across a section of his broad vest was a heavy watch chain, made of leather links. Diving a chunky fist into a hip pocket he drew forth a holstered revolver which he carefully tossed into the desk before him.

At the right of his desk was a complete arsenal—a cabinet in which stood a row of menacing Winchesters. In a corner of the room rested another case and it contained an assortment of handcuffs and some balls and chains, the whole reminiscent of a chamber in a penitentiary.

This man, the up-to-date chief of detectives of a big railroad with Chicago terminals, says the Chicago News, is the man who directs a continuous campaign against thieves who invade the yards of the system and break open freight and passenger cars, stations and freight sheds, carrying away anything liftable. It is the duty of this railroad police constable, whose official title is "chief special agent," to put up his shields, so to speak, at every point on a great system and keep an eye at long range on a small army of assistants who run down robber bands which infest the road. Thus, from Chicago to Texas and California, the chief special agent of one of the through western lines is kept busy catching thieves and sending them to prison.

A few years ago the business of the special agents became so important that it was found necessary to organize an association, with a regularly paid secretary. Chicago was made the headquarters because this city is the most important railroad center on the continent. To this official are reported details of the work accomplished by the special agents of the various railroads. When a freight car has been plundered the fact is reported and so also if a brass knob has been stolen from a passenger coach.

John J. Risdon, the secretary of the association, probably is better informed concerning the crimes against railroads and shippers than any other person, for it is through him, as a sort of a "human clearing house," that special agents east and west and north and south, report cases of thievery. He has figures covering the extent of depredations, but they are not made public.

One of the methods in favor with professional railroad thieves is to "spot" a box car loaded with a quantity of silk, enter it through the end door at Buffalo or some other point and accompany it on its journey until it arrives at a quiet place out in the country many miles away where the grade is heavy, necessitating slow going. When a place agreed upon has been reached the plunder is tossed out to confederates in waiting with a team of horses and wagon.

In Chicago and other cities the freight car thieves are not too particular about what they steal. They will go after anything, according to Mr. Risdon. Some loot the cars for merchandise of all sorts, with a preference for provisions and liquors. Others seek out clothing.

REPLICA OF HUDSON'S SHIP.

THE HALF MOON.

A reproduction of the Half Moon, the vessel in which Henry Hudson crossed the Atlantic from Holland and sailed up the Hudson river 200 years ago, arrived in New York on the deck of a big freighter and sailed up the Hudson during the Hudson-Fulton celebration. The vessel was sent over by Holland as its contribution to the celebration.

It is built of heavy oak timber, with the high poop and long-nosed prow now seen only in prints of Dutch and Spanish galleons. She is of eighty tons displacement, sixty-three feet long, eighteen feet beam and draws seven and one-half feet of water. Her crew consists of twenty men. The vessel is rigged with hand-woven sails, carries hand-worked flags and is antique enough in her fittings to confuse the best seamen afloat.

Two cannon are mounted amidship on the 'tween decks, whose ceiling is so low that one has to bend nearly double to get along, and port holes on either side allow these weapons to be used.

A library, or rather, a book shelf, has been fitted up. It contains the books which Hudson took with him—a Bible, a prayer book and books of voyages. A chart is spread out on the cabin tables, and near at hand are compass and measuring instruments, sand glass and the rough nautical instruments of the time. A gun or two in a rack and a pile of shot and bags of powder are shown, together with a copy of the supposed contract which Hudson had with the Dutch East India Company, the original being lost.

Lieutenant Lam, who played the part of Hendrik Hudson on the Half Moon in the celebration, was clad in the style of captains of such vessels in the beginning of the seventeenth century, and the men under him were dressed in the fashion in vogue in Holland at that period.

BOYS TRY TO BURN COMPANION AT STAKE.

Cruelly tortured by a band of boys playing Indians, 13-year-old Paul Kepner, according to a dispatch, is a nervous wreck at the home of his parents in Millersburg, Pa. Kepner says a dozen boys captured him, and, binding his feet and hands, dragged him to a telegraph pole. There they laced him to the upright. One of the lads then packed newspapers around Kepner's feet and another applied a lighted match. Their victim's screams so frightened the tormentors that they stamped out the flames and released Kepner, only to lock him up in a coal shed. Then they continued their "war dance" around the imprisoned youth. Finally, Kepner succeeded in getting a pitchfork, and with it forced his way to freedom.

CIGARS FIT TO SMOKE.

When and Where Domestic and Imported Article Should Be Indulged In.

SURE OF THE ALL-HAVANA.

Cause of Nervous and Other Troubles—The Moderate Use of Mild Tobaccos.

We all know him—the man who is always "just about to quit tobacco for good," but whose swear-off never materializes," the Philadelphia Ledger says. A veteran smoker was discussing this question the other night. "It's too bad," said he, "that so many men are constantly quarreling with such an excellent friend as tobacco. In the strain and hurry of modern business life they need the quieting, soothing effect of tobacco. That is proved by the fact that though men are always resolving to give up smoking, they seldom ever succeed in doing it. Look over your own acquaintances.

"I used to be numbered among that unfortunate crowd until I made the discovery that there is such a thing as a rational smoke diet, and that when once a man puts himself upon this there is no physical nor mental need to swear off tobacco.

"This is my cigar diet: After breakfast and during the forenoon light domestic cigars; after luncheon, if I have a half-hour leisure, a small Havana; in the afternoon, domestic cigars, and after dinner, if I can sit down and have no business worries or other mental cares, my favorite Havana.

Lure of All-Havana Cigar.

"If the average smoker only used a little common sense he'd have no complaint about cigars. Moderately used tobacco is a gentle stimulant, but too much stimulation, like too much of everything else, is bound to hurt a man. Now, the tobacco used in all-Havana cigars is grown in a rainy climate in a wet, clayey soil that produces a luxuriant, heavy-leaved plant. It contains more nicotine than any other kind of tobacco. The better grades of domestic tobacco, grown in light, sandy soil, average less than half as much nicotine. So you can readily see where the difference lies.

"Years of experience have proved to my satisfaction that my way is the only way to smoke. We're living at a faster rate nowadays. We want to smoke oftener, and to satisfy that craving with as little injury to our health as possible we must smoke something lighter than a heavy Havana cigar. Mind you, I'm not downing the Havana. It's all right in its place. I'm a worshiper of the Havana myself, but I realize that it is far too good to smoke continually. Its only proper place is in one's leisure hours.

Smoking Out of Doors.

"There are a great many men who smoke out of doors. This practice has no excuse whatever. A cigar indoors is a pleasure, but out of doors it is nothing but a habit. Of course, by this I do not mean to speak of the time that a man may be sitting on a piazza or under a tree at rest. Then he may light a cigar and get full enjoyment from it. The times I refer to are when a man is walking or golfing or motoring or taking part in any other outdoor activity. At such a time he cannot taste his cigar, and oftentimes must look at the end of it to see whether it is still lighted. A man when in the fresh air should take advantage of the opportunity to free his lungs and system generally from the nicotine that they have accumulated at other times.

"If a man will avoid smoking at the times that I have mentioned, and at the other times smoke only light, mild cigars, he will find that he has no longer any quarrel with tobacco. There is one other recommendation that I would make, and that is that he use a holder instead of putting the cigar in his mouth. Holding a cigar in the mouth brings the delicate mucous membranes in direct contact with the tobacco and entails a greater absorption of nicotine than though a holder were used. But don't let him get the fad of coloring an old meerschaum holder. The accumulation of nicotine in this has a far more injurious effect than the holding of the cigar in the mouth. Let him get a cheap holder—the kind that as soon as it shows the slightest taint of nicotine can be thrown away and a new one used."

For Lame Back

An aching back is instantly relieved by an application of Sloan's Liniment.

This liniment takes the place of massage and is better than sticky plasters. It penetrates—without rubbing—through the skin and muscular tissue right to the bone, quickens the blood, relieves congestion, and gives permanent as well as temporary relief.

Here's the Proof.

Mr. James C. Lee, of 1100 9th St., S.E., Washington, D.C., writes: "Thirty years ago I fell from a scaffold and seriously injured my back. I suffered terribly at times; from the small of my back all around my stomach was just as if I had been beaten with a club. I used every plaster I could get with no relief. Sloan's Liniment took the pain right out, and I can now do as much ladder work as any man in the shop, thanks to

Sloan's Liniment

Mr. J. P. Evans, of Mt. Airy, Ga., says: "After being afflicted for three years with rheumatism, I used Sloan's Liniment, and was cured sound and well, and am glad to say I haven't been troubled with rheumatism since. My leg was badly swollen from my hip to my knee. One-half a bottle took the pain and swelling out."

Sloan's Liniment has no equal as a remedy for Rheumatism, Neuralgia or any pain or stiffness in the muscles or joints.

The Apple Barrel.

It stood in the cellar low and dim,
Where the cobwebs swept and swayed,
Holding the store from bough and limb
At the feet of autumn laid.
And oft, when the days were short and drear
And the north wind shricked and roared,
We children sought in the corner here,
And drew on the toothsome hoard.

For thus through the long, long winter-time
It answered our every call
With wine of the summer's golden prime
Sealed by the hand of fall.
The best there was of the earth and air,
Of rain and sun and breeze,
Changed to a pippin sweet and rare
By the art of the faithful trees.

A wonderful barrel was this, had we
Its message but rightly heard,
Filled with the tales of wind and bee,
Of cricket and moth and bird;
Rife with the bliss of the fragrant June
When skies were soft and blue:
Thronged with the dreams of a harvest moon
O'er fields drenched deep with dew.

Oh, homely barrel, I'd fain essay
Your marvelous skill again;
Take me back to the past, I pray,
As willingly now as then—
Back to the tender morns and eves,
The noontides warm and still,
The fleecy clouds and the spangled leaves
Of the orchard over the hill.

"First" Mortgages.

By reason of the insistence of many investors that their bonds be of "first" mortgage, it may be said that the importance of the word "first" is dependent upon the circumstances, says Moody's Magazine. A bond may be first in fact; it may be so only in a relative sense in that it indicates the order in which the bond was put out by the issuing company; or the use of the term "first" in the name of the bond, undesirable and loose though it is in such instances, may be upon the slight ground that the mortgage is inferred first on some part of the property, while on other parts it may have but a third or fourth claim. It is therefore obvious that the mere presence of this term in a title does not necessarily make the bond an absolutely prior lien. It has been estimated that 95 per cent in number and 95 per cent in value of steam railroad "firsts" are first liens in name only.

Composition of Vegetables.

While vegetables are given a low value as food for man or beast on account of their large percentage of water, the dry portion is highly nutritive. In the potato the 22 per cent of solid matter is nearly all available for food. The proteids as flesh formers and the carbohydrates as fat producers are essential parts of food.

Hired Man and the Boss.

An exchange presents each of the two sides of the farm labor question in this somewhat homely but forcible manner:

"He felt that he was working too hard for the pay received; he knew better than the boss how the work should be laid out; he caroused on Sunday and was dead to the world Monday; he was jealous of the other hired men—he got fired!

"He had no regular hours; he shifted teams from one man to another; he spent his time in town; he had plenty of spare room in his house, but gave the hired man the best in the hay loft; he grumbled about trifles—his hired man quit."

Fowls and Eggs.

Farmers' Bulletin No. 128, United States Department of Agriculture, says: "The eggs of different kinds of domestic poultry vary in size as well as appearance, and there is also a considerable range in the size of eggs of different breeds. Thus, hens' eggs range from the small ones laid by bantams to the large ones laid by such breeds as light Brahmas. On an average a hen's egg is 2.27 inches in length, and 1.73 inches in diameter or width at the broadest point, and weighs about 2 ounces, or eight eggs to the pound (1½ pounds per dozen). Generally speaking, the eggs of pullets are smaller than those of old hens; those of ducks somewhat larger than hens' eggs, while those of turkeys and geese are considerably larger. Guinea eggs, on an average, measure 1⅞x1½ inches, are rather pointed at one end, and weigh about 1.4 ounces each, or 17 ounces to the dozen. Goose eggs weigh about 5.5 to 6.7 ounces each, or about 5 pounds to the dozen—that is, more than three times as much as hens' eggs. The eggs of wild birds are said to be smaller than those of the same species when domesticaeed. Wild ducks' eggs are said to be, on an average, 1.97 to 2.17 inches in diameter; domestic ducks' eggs, 2.36 to 2.56 inches.

A Troublesome Weed.

Reports come from Ontario that the perennial sow thistle has gained a firm foothold, making it the greatest weed enemy with which the farmer has to contend. It has been spread from one farm to another by the threshing machines, the numerous seeds being easily carried. One method being advocated for its eradication is to sow winter rye in September and pasture it the folowing spring. This can be followed in June by rye, turnips or buckwheat. In this way crops are secured and the sow thistle fought at the same time.

Woman in Chicken Yard.

September is a good month to look about for stock, and if one has not already settled upon a particular variety, a hint in that direction may be of some use. Unless a woman can afford to keep plenty of help she should not keep over fifty fowls. I feel that I am writing for the woman who takes care of her chickens herself, and to her would say that if she has the room it is a good plan to keep a small flock of two varieties—one for broilers or fricassees and one for laying eggs, and when it comes to the genuine business, then give me the Black Minorcas. The eggs are large and pure white. The hens are almost perpetual layers and do not make good mothers. The eggs will command the highest fancy prices, and if your stock is pure you can sell the eggs for sittings at prices according to the stock you keep.

The Plymouth Rocks or the Wyandottes are suitable breeds for broilers or for home use. I think there is more money in the selling of eggs to private customers, or even in the markets, than in broilers. There is less work and less worry. The latter fowl is a good layer if she does not get too fat, but when this occurs make a potpie of her.

Hints on Hog Raising.

Salt buried a few inches in the ground in certain spots will attract the hogs and confine them pretty closely to such places.

It is natural for a hog to root, but if you want to prevent him from doing so a simple ring in the snout will answer the purpose.

It is a great mistake to mark a hog by mutilating his ears. Better use a metal tag.

Successful hog raisers will always have clover or alfalfa pastures for their animals.

Every hog pasture ought to have an open shed on a high point of ground for shelter from the hot sun. Leave all sides open so the air can pass over them.

Keep the pigs growing from the day they are born until they go to the slaughtering pen.

The man who imagines that he can produce fat and lean bacon in streaks by feeding one week and starving the next will be disappointed.

Keep the Road Drag Going.

Bad roads are an extravagance that no farming community can afford. Just what they cost in unnecessary expenses it takes but a moment to determine.

A team and driver are reasonably worth $3 a day, and by the use of these it is possible to deliver to market from your home 100 bushels of corn. Hauling over good roads, the cost of delivery is 3 cents per bushel. But if, in consequence of bad roads, but fifty bushels can be delivered, the cost is doubled and the difference is what the impassible roads cost you. Continue this calculation, applying it to the hauling of all your crops, and it quickly becomes apparent that it amounts to a very burdensome tax.

Good roads help in every way; they promote sociability by making friends and relatives accessible, and by means of them it is easier to reach the schools and churches and to generally do and enjoy the things which make life really worth living.

Look out for the head lice upon the chicks. They will soon suck their lives away if not gotten rid of by rubbing a little coal oil upon the feathers.

It looks like a waste when thinning the fruit on the trees, but the harvest time of larger and better fruit proves the wisdom of the course.

Preserving Hints.

The first consideration is a preserving kettle of brass polished until lustrous and with no stain of fruit.

This is the sort of vessel used by the old-fashioned housewife and the jellies of our grandmothers have never been equaled.

Porcelain kettles should be discarded as soon as they commence to crack and tin, iron or pewter should never be used.

The best jelly bag is a long one made of flannel, which is made in a point at the bottom.

This should never be squeezed in order to hasten the dropping or a discoloration of the fruit will result.

In selecting fruit the greatest care should be taken to see that it is not overripe.

Berries that have been picked more than 24 hours are too old to make good jelly and preserves.

A cheesecloth bag will be found useful in straining the fruit through the colander.

Prune Jelly.

Stew a quart of prunes in a quart of water until they fall to pieces. Press through a colander. Soak a box of gelatin in a cupful of cold water; pour on gradually a cupful of boiling water and stir until thoroughly dissolved. Add one pint of the prune pulp, the juice of a lemon or orange and a little sugar. Strain into wet mold. Put in cool place. Turn out and serve with whipped cream.

Good Doughnuts.

Two cups of hot mashed potatoes, four tablespoons of shortening, three cups of sugar, four eggs, three cups milk, five teaspoons of baking powder and flour, enough to make the usual consistency of doughnut dough. Make a cream of potatoes, shortening, sugar and nutmeg for flavor. Then sift about four cups of flour with the baking powder; add to the mixture as much flour as needed.

Old-Fashioned Drop Cakes.

Cream a scant cup of sugar with one-half cup of shortening, add a cup of molasses, one-half teaspoonful of powdered cloves and cinnamon, mixed, one teaspoonful of salt and two level teaspoonfuls of baking soda dissolved in one cup of cold water. Add enough flour to make a quite thick batter and drop this from a spoon into a greased pan. Bake in a quick oven.

Canning Sweet Corn.

For canning, cut the same as for drying. To thirteen pints of corn add one pint of salt and one pint sugar in granite pan and stir till it forms its own juice. Set on back of stove, where it will heat and stay hot for an hour or more, then draw to front of stove till it comes to a boil and can. For canning or drying always use corn rather too soft than too hard.

Delicious Broiled Steak.

Sprinkle the bottom of a skillet quite generously with salt. Place on the fire and let it become quite hot. Now put in your steak, turning frequently, so as to retain the juice. When done place on a heated platter and season with pepper; also add small bits of butter. This makes any steak quite tender and insures a rich flavor.

Rochester Gingerbread.

Beat half a cup of butter to a cream; gradually beat in half a cup of sugar, two well-beaten eggs, one cup of molasses, one cup of thick, sour milk and three cups of flour, sifted with one teaspoonful and a half of soda, one teaspoonful of ginger and one teaspoonful of cinnamon. Bake in two brick-loaf pans.

Corn and Sweet Potatoes.

Cut the kernels from six ears of boiled corn. Cut into dice four large boiled sweet potatoes. Melt a tablespoonful of butter in a frying pan and stir into this the corn and sweet potatoes. Fry, stirring often, for ten minutes, then serve.

Green Tomato Mince Pie.

Chop fine one pint of green tomatoes and three large apples. Add three cups of sugar, three tablespoons of flour, one-half cup of vinegar, one-half teaspoon of salt, and one teaspoon of mixed spices. Bake with two crusts.

Short Suggestions.

A pinch of soda stirred into milk that is to be boiled will keep it from curdling.

To keep tins bright, wash well with strong hot soda and water; when dry polish with a cloth and a little powdered whiting.

Parsley may be kept fresh and green for several days if it is put in a covered earthen jar in a cool place. It will last longer than in water.

To clean old glass pour strong ammonia on it, scrub well with a brush and rinse in clean water. Dry and polish, and it will then appear as new.

When hot cake or light bread will not cut smoothly heat a knife to the temperature of the bread or cake and it may be easily cut by so doing.

If you overboil potatoes you can drain off the water and dry them out over the fire. Afterward they can be mashed and beaten in the usual way.

Brasses take a most beautiful polish if washed in a mixture made of one ounce of alum and a pint of lye, boiled together and used while still warm.

Wringing out a cloth in hot water and wiping furniture well before putting on furniture cream will result in a high polish and will not show finger marks.

Put stale crackers into a pan, throw over them a handful of salt and brown. Shake off the salt and the crackers will have a delicious taste as good as when new.

MORE "POOR MAN'S DIGGINGS."

Alaskan Discoveries Promise Well for the Man Without Capital.

According to the current stories from Alaska, poor man's diggings of great promise have been struck in the Innoko country, southeast of Norton sound, and there is a general stampede to the new camp, says the Seattle Post-Intelligencer. This is the third season of prospecting in that region, and each report received tells of rich strikes made in the shallow diggings, which give it its characteristic of poor man's camp.

What has made Alaska and the British Yukon is the poor man's diggings. The original prospectors had none of them money enough to buy machinery or to transport it into the country of magnificent distances and no transportation facilities. Neither would capital have been enlisted during the present generation in development work on mines in Alaska had it not been for the immense wealth taken out by men of no capital save their own brawn and energy. The Klondike was a poor man's camp in its inception, and paid the original locators from the grass roots down. So rich were the claims that the first miners got money sufficient to purchase their supplies during the first winter after discovery by panning the dirt off their dumps with melted snow.

Some of the best discoveries in Alaskas of recent years have been at such depths in the frozen ground that it was useless for a man without capital to attempt to open a claim. It required money to put in the appliance for thawing the frozen ground and sinking to considerable depth. But men with capital are now willing to take over all such properties, and development proceeds apace.

If reports should prove to be true, the Innoko country promises to give the poor man a chance to make a mine.

Hitherto the use of the falls of the river Rhone for the production of electric power has been almost confined to the Swiss part of the stream, but a project is on foot for the utilization of the falls at Genissiat, in French territory, for the production of electric power to be sent to Paris. The falls have a descent of over 200 feet, and it is estimated that they will produce 150,000 kilowatts per hour, an amount of energy the production of which would demand the consumption of more than 200 tons of coal.

Sir William Ramsay and R. W. Graw have liquefied and, they believe, solidified the emanation from radium, which is popularly famous for changing spontaneously into helium. The boiling point of the emanation at atmospheric pressure is 43.5 degrees below zero centigrade. The liquid is slightly phosphorescent, but if it is cooled with liquid air it begins to glow with a white light, which passes first to yellow and then to orange. In the microscope the light resembles a little electric arc. On removing the liquid air the colors succeed each other in the reverse order, and a blue color appears, followed by a change as if the crystals of a solid were dissolving. The experimenters believe that the brilliantly luminous substance seen is the emanation in the solid state.

Since 1906 diamonds have been found in Pike County, Ark., in rock similar to that of the diamond fields of South Africa. It is a peridotite of igneous origin which has been pushed up through carboniferous and cretaceous formations. In some places the rock is very hard and dense, but in others it has weathered to a soft yellowish and greenish material 20 to 25 feet deep. About 600 diamonds have been found in this rock, the largest weighing 6½ carats. The usual colors are white, brown and yellow; but one blue diamond and several black ones have been found. One bore for exploration has been driven to a depth of 205 feet. As to the prospects of more stones being found by deeper mining, geologists only say that the spasmodic exploitation thus far seems to indicate a good promise.

VALUABLE HOME RECIPE

Will Break Up Severest Cold in a Day and Cure Any Curable Cough.

Mix one-half ounce of Concentrated pine compound with two ounces of glycerine and a half pint of good whiskey. Shake thoroughly each time and use in doses of a teaspoonful to a tablespoonful every four hours.

This formula is given out by a noted medical authority whose remarkable cures are well known to the profession. Local druggists say this mixture will work wonders for the treatment of all throat and lung diseases. Any druggist has these ingredients or will get them for you from his wholesale house.

The Concentrated pine comes only in half ounce bottles, each enclosed in an air-tight case, but be sure to get only that labeled "Concentrated."

The ingenious author, knowing the sameness of costume descriptions in the best sellers, and also knowing how to make an appeal to the feminine heart, wrote:

Rabies Laid to Strange Cause.

In Baluchistan even the wolves go mad. In his book, "The Frontiers of Baluchistan," G. P. Tate writes: "The shepherds give a strange reason for the epidemic of rabies. According to them it was caused by the wild beasts eating dead larks. In some years, they said, the larks develop extraordinary vitality and pour forth such a flood of songs as they rise on the wing that they become suffocated and fall to the ground dead. A wild animal which eats one of those dead birds infallibly develops rabies. This is a widespread superstition and seems not unfamiliar to the natives of India who were with me."

Grip Has Twenty-one Names.

Bishop Thornton, who is anxious to find an alternative to the "smooth, suave name" of influenza, should consult "La Grippe," by Dr. G. Andre, a work published last October. There he will find a list of twenty-one names bestowed by the French on that unpleasant malady since its first appearance in A. D. 475. The most appropriate and popular name appears to be "la grippe," which was given because of the sudden and violent way in which patients are seized. Another popular name in the eighteenth century was "petit courrier," because it reached everybody. Most of the French names, however, are quite as suave as our own, but some of the terms employed by other nations are sufficiently harsh to suit the greatest sufferers, the most effective in Dr. Andre's list being the Swedish "snufsjuka" and the Dutch "zinkingghoorts."—London Chronicle.

SOLID GOLD & SILVER AWARD

For the Best Ear of Corn

To be Known as the W. K. Kellogg National Corn Trophy

To be Awarded at the National Corn Exposition, Omaha, December 6 to 18, 1909.

Over one hundred thousand million (100,000,000,000) ears of corn were grown in the United States last year. Over a billion dollars were paid for them. More than a million and a quarter extra dollars went into the pockets of the farmers for corn this year than they received for the previous year's crop.

The reason for this may be found in the fact that the people of the United States are beginning to learn how delicious corn is and to realize its full food value.

Kellogg's Toasted Corn Flakes has placed corn among the indispensable items of daily fare.

The makers, therefore, are interested in the development of the King of Cereals, and have decided to award a beautiful trophy for the man, woman or child who can produce the best ear of corn in two different seasons.

Professor Holden, of the Iowa State College, the greatest authority on corn in the world, will award the prize at the National Corn Exposition, to be held at Omaha, Neb., December 6th to 18th, 1909. Two simple rules will govern the plan, and they are:—that you send your best ear of corn to the National Corn Exposition, Omaha, Neb., before November 27, 1909; and that you are a member of the National Corn Association. Full particulars regarding which can be had by writing to National Corn Exposition, Omaha, Neb. Tie a tag securely to your specimen and word it, "For the Kellogg Trophy Contest," and write your name and address plainly. If yours is judged the best, you will get the trophy for 1910. If you succeed again next year or the year following, the trophy will become your property for all time. In other words, you must produce the best ear of corn two different years.

There will be no restrictions. Any man, woman or child belonging to the Association can enter. It will be open to every state in the Union. Professor Holden will judge the corn particularly on the basis of quality. The growing of more corn per acre is one object of the award, but the main purpose of the founder of the trophy is for

Waterloo

Good morning Uncle Powers, sharpen up your teeth for a Waterloo Thanksgiving chicken.

Mrs. Roman Hankey, in the north part of town, is quite sick.

Elmer Goodwin and wife, W. H. Hinman and wife and H. M. Moore and wife spent Sunday at Auburn.

Melvin Bevier and family, of Kendallville, were guests at his father's over Sunday.

W. H. Forest and wife of Moores, spent several days last week with her brother, Hiram Moore and family.

Elmer Goodwin says he has the finest corn this year he ever raised. He had 425 baskets from a piece of new ground of a trifle over three acres.

Croup is most prevalent during the dry cold weather of the early winter months. Parents of young children should be prepared for it. All that is needed is a bottle of Chamberlain's Cough Remedy. Many mothers are never without it in their homes and it has never disappointed them. Sold by Geo. W. Geddes 44-1m

C. B. Jackson and wife attended church at Rehabeth Sunday.

Ray Houk and sister Grace attended church at Spencerville Sunday.

John Means is through with his tree business and now he is taking orders for spring. He has quite a lot already

John Moody is getting better again for a little while until another of his bad spells.

Saturday night occured the death of John S. Boots, 3 miles west of Spencerville. He came to DeKalb county in 1849, and died at the age of 87. He has been a public man and always advocated public improvements. He was ever ready to help his fellow man and in former days he was ever ready to do all in his power in sickness and death anywhere in the community.

He probably will be buried Wednesday as they are waiting on Mrs. Kimes his daughter from Oklahoma.

Peace to his ashes. May his deeds of charity long be remembered.

Edgerton

The Methodist of the Defiance district held their conference in Edgerton Monday and Tuesday of this week. There were several ministers of the district present and there was a good attendance at all of the meetings. The conference closed Tuesday night with a lecture by Dr. Mundhall, of Philadelphia, on "The Book of Books" to a crowded house. Mr. Mundhall has not only a National reputation but an International reputation on this lecture. He proved by his argument that the Bible was an inspired writing.

Dr. Hathaway has improved the appearance of the building occupied by Mr. Hartong as a shoe shop by putting on a new front and painting same.

Imm Bros. expect to start up in the agricultural building in a few days.

Mrs. Dunlap departed this life last Sunday morning. Her funeral was held at the Disciple church Tuesday conducted by Rev. Johnson, assisted by Revs. Couch and Braden. Interment was made in Maple Grove cemetery. In the death of Mrs. Dunlap the church has lost a great worker and the town a good citizen. She was a member of the school board at the time of her taking ill.

There was no school Tuesday on account of the funeral of Mrs. Dunlap.

The first number on the lecture course was last Friday evening. It was the Ramos Spanish orchestra.

M. C. McGuire was in Bryan, Monday, on business.

Mrs. Borton of Butler spent several days with her sister, Mrs. John Jinnings in Edgerton.

Dr. L. H. Harrison and wife of Butler were the guests of J. A. Jennings and family last Friday.

Grayden Upp went to Toledo, Sunday, where he will work in an automobile factory.

Otis Goeltzenleutcher was in Bryan, Monday, as a witness before the grand jury.

The sink at Mina is still going down from five to ten inches every twenty-four hours.

Interest in the meeting at the Disciple church still continues with Mr. Coutch, of Metz, and Mr. Braden, of Butler assisting, but as yet no accessions.

Lame back comes on suddenly and is extremely painful. It is caused by rheumatism of the muscles. Quick relief is afforded by applying Chamberlain's Liniment. Sold by Geo. W. Geddes. 44-1m

Eat What

You want of the food you need Kodol will digest it.

You need a sufficient amount of good wholesome food and more than this you need to fully digest it.

Else you can't gain strength, nor can you strengthen your stomach if it is weak.

You must eat in order to live and maintain strength.

You must not diet, because the body requires that you eat a sufficient amount of food regularly.

But this food must be digested, and it must be digested thoroughly.

When the stomach can't do it, you must take something that will help the stomach.

The proper way to do is to eat what you want, and let Kodol digest the food.

Nothing else can do this. When the stomach is weak it needs help; you must help it by giving it rest, and Kodol will do that.

Our Guarantee

Go to your druggist today, and purchase a dollar bottle, and if you can honestly say, that you did not receive any benefits from it, after using the entire bottle, the druggist will refund your money to you without question or delay.

We will pay the druggist the price of the bottle purchased by you.

This offer applies to the large bottle only and to but one in a family.

We could not afford to make such an offer, unless we positively knew what Kodol will do for you.

It would bankrupt us.

The dollar bottle contains 2½ times as much as the fifty cent bottle.

Kodol is made at the laboratories of E. C. DeWitt & Co., Chicago.

Mr. and Mrs. C. W. Beard Attend Wedding of a Friend

Married at the United Brethren parsonage at 12 o'clock noon, Tuesday, J. A. Davis officiating, Earl C. Sunday and Goldie C. Ebal, both of Pleasant Lake.

Mr. and Mrs. C. W. Beard attended the marriage of Mr. Irvin Cook to Miss Ileth Imhoff, at Alvarado, last Thursday evening at at o'clock. Thirty-six of the immediate friends and relatives were present. At the close of the ceremony a very elaborate supper was served by the bride's mother. These worthy young people will make their future home two miles west of Edon, Ohio.

Judge and Mrs. Frank S. Roby, of Indianapolis, have announced the approaching marriage of their daughter, Myrtle Man, to William F. Schick, of Newark, N. J., which will be solemnized at their residence on December 22.

Mr. and Mrs. Sam Aldrich announce the marriage of their daughter, Doris E. Aldrich, to Earle R. Rolfe, Wednesday, Nov. 3rd, 1909, Los Angeles, Cal. They are at home to their friends at Barstow, Cal. The bride has a host of friends in Hamilton who will join with The NEWS in congratulations.—Hamilton News

A marriage license was issued Monday afternoon to Ora Crooks, twenty-two, son of Sheldon Crooks, and Miss Dora Leahy, twenty-one, daughter of Patrick Leahy. It is understood that the wedding ceremony will be performed in the local Catholic church Wednesday morning, although information relative to the time is not obtainable at this time.—Courier.

Last Thursday evening at the home of the bride's parents, Mr. and Mrs. Christian Schlatter, east of Harlan, occurred the marriage of their youngest daughter, Sylvia, to Simon Zehr, of near Geneva, Ind. Mr. and Mrs. Zehr will make their future home on a farm near Geneva, Ind. The Review extends congratulations.—Grabill Review.

CURES REMOVE DOUBT ABOUT ECZEMA CURE

Read What Your Druggist Says About Oil of Wintergreen Compound

Druggist S. G. Stone submits the following to the readers of the HERALD:

For several years we have announced, with our recommendation, that we had found a positive cure for eczema; a simple skin wash, oil of wintergreen compounded with other healing ingredients.

Yet we know there are people right in this town who have eczema, and still have never tried this remedy.

We have, therefore, arranged with the D. D. D. Laboratories of Chicago for a special offer of a trial bottle at 25 cents instead of the $1.00 bottle as regularly sold.

We offer this trial bottle with our recommendation and assurance that just as soon as the patient washes his itching skin, this mild liquid will take the itch away instantly. S. G. Stone, Druggist, Butler, Ind.

Lived 152 Years

Wm. Parr—England's oldest man—married the third time at 120, worked in the fields till 132 and lived 20 years longer. People should be youthful at 80. James Wright, of Sturlock, Ky., shows how to remain young. "I feel just like a 16-year-old boy," he writes, after taking six bottles of Electric Bitters. For thirty years Kidney trouble made life a burden, but the first bottle of this wonderful medicine convinced me I had found the greatest cure on earth." They're a godsend to weak, sickly rundown or old people. Try them. 50c at Stone's drug store.

SCHOOL NOTES

Pithy Paragraphs From Our Public Schools

JUNIOR NOTES

It is test week again.

The B. H. S. will play the Hamilton high school a game of foot ball Thanksgiving day.

Ethel Higley was absent Monday morning.

The Sophomores have almost finished Julius Caesar.

We received quite a number of new encyclopedias last week.

Tuesday afternoon at 3:30, there came a knock at the door which almost broke it in. Such things are funny, although we dare not laugh.

Mr. A. says we should not believe all that we hear.

Miss A. "Why, Grayce, that hasn't any more to do with it than black cats. Mr. Beams what is this?"

FRESHMEN NOTES

Blanche isn't afraid of cats now adays. Quiz her and see.

For authority on bread making consult Mr. A. on Ruth H.

(Mr. A. in Botany class)—"The baker uses plenty of alum in his bread, and it is a good thing for his pocketbook, making it light."

Miss A. "That's the answer I've been fishing for."

Mr. A. gave section one of the Bot any class some nice little bottles. How he loves his baby dolls.

"Vera, do you have to find everything in books? Haven't you anything in your brain?"

We had three tests Monday. My! but they are hard on us.

Poor L. T. It's dreadful when you receive punishment for other folks misdeeds.

Jennie Cain was absent Friday.

Mr. A. says we aren't so much after all.

Most of the school looked rather washed out Monday.

Vacation at last! We all deserve a rest, all right.

What funny pronunciations D. A. B. puts on some of his English words.

Loren Bryant spells egg, egge!

(Vera in Botany class) "The Algae vary in size according to their length." Isn't that strange.

Mabel Cabana was absent Tuesday morning.

No matter how dignified we Freshies are. Mr. Austin will persist in calling us "this bunch."

Heavy Rain Fills Cellars

As a result of the heavy rain which lasted Sunday night and Monday and the fact that the Lake Shore Ry. Co. tapped the county ditch, running the water therefrom onto the property owners living along their tracks in the east part of the city, considerable damage is reported, and the company will be asked to make good the amount of property destroyed. D. W. Steward's residence was surrounded by water for several hours, while one man reported that the water came into his barn and his horses stood in water up to their knees. Much damage was done to cellars which were not properly tapped into the new sewer.

Criticising the Paper

There are always those who are ever ready and anxious to offer criticism if a slight mistake appears in a newspaper, either grammatically or typographically speaking, and the very same individuals who are prone to ferret out each trivial error in a periodical, were they to attempt to write one hundredth the amount that appears each day in a daily newspaper, would undoubtedly expose their ignorance more noticeably than those who have had some little experience in the business. It is an utter impossibility to write many columns of news matter each day without errors creeping into the articles, however careful one may be and even the critically inclide party residing in Auburn who finds much consolation in depicting trivial errors from articles in local newspapers would probably not do better than the average newspaper man who has had years of experience in the business.—Auburn Courier.

BOYS ACCUSED OF GREASING LENSE

Manager Lennon Don't Believe Machine Was Tampered With

If the newspapers keep up their publicity of the Butler boys it won't be long until a young man will be embarrassed when asked where he is from, no matter how good his character may be. If the Butler boys are such terrible bad boys and if they deserve to be dubbed hoodlums and outlaws and accused of all manner of mean things, why don't some one prefer charges against them and send them over the road so that all the boys won't be classed bad as some of the "dope" writers try to make out. The article we now refer to appeared in the Fort Wayne Journal-Gazette under the signature of the Kist News Bureau, and stated that the stereopticon machine of Mr. Ben C. VanHeyde, the ex-saloon keeper, who lectured in the opera house last Sunday evening, had been treated to a coating of grease. We do not believe any such thing to be true, and even if it is, why do they not make the guilty ones pay for it and not give the whole town a bad reputation because of one or two bad boys. If they have no evidence they are clear out of place by saying it was done by the boys. The manager of the opera house denounces it as a lie, and says that if the machine was greased Mr. VanHeyde knows who did it. Who are the "boys" and why does the writer not name them out instead of putting it the way he does? Parents should make an investigation and learn if possible who is doing it and make them furnish evidence to substantiate their accusations. Such things will kill the self-respect of any boy, and when that is done you might as well kill the boy for he will neither benefit himself or society. Butler boys are no worse than other boys and do not deserve the dirty newspaper insults which have been flung at them the past few weeks. It is a damnable disgrace to the profession and ought to be stopped.

Royal Neighbors Entertain

Last Tuesday evening the Royal Neighbors entertained the Relief Corps. A fine program was given which was certainly enjoyed by all present.

A delicious lunch was afterwards served that the committee in charge showed themselves competent for any occasion. At a late hour all departed for their homes feeling that a very pleasant evening had been spent.

THE CHILLY ESKIMO DOES NOT CARE FOR OUR SOCIETY

He Fears That Civilization Will Follow Close Upon the Explorers' Lead and That Extermination of His Race Will Result.

Drying Fish in the Summer

NORTH of the Arctic circle, north of the lands where any tree will grow, live a race of furry-trousered little men—and, for the matter of that, women; for there the ladies wear the breeches in more sense than one. The Eskimo averages something under 5 feet 5 inches in height, has a merry little flat face, with high, prominent cheekbones, and eyes slightly upturned at the outer corners, betraying his Mongolian origin. He rarely grows any hair on his face, but makes up for it by a plentiful mop of dark black hair on his head. The ladies—especially the young ones—do theirs in a most elaborate and very stiff topknot. As to complexion, it is so very rarely that one really sees an Eskimo's complexion that it is hard to define. As a matter of fact, his real coloring is about that of an ordinary gypsy; but he is usually disguised under a thick coating of smoke from blubber-oil lamps, combined with the accumulation of years of happy unwashedness.

Now that the way has been blazed, it will be an easy matter to penetrate the frozen North. The hitherto locked door to the land of perpetual ice and snow has been opened. The world greets the announcement with acclaim. New space has been added to the world's mapped areas. Civilization will march on. All nations join in rejoicing—all except one, the most vitally interested. The Eskimo, native of the land of snow and ice, does not welcome the white man's coming. Beside his igloo he sits and listens to the tribal rumors of the coming events. He hears the weird, garbled tale of how a "civilized man," a "kabhena," has reached the North Pole. He hears that other white men will come after him. And he sits and grieves for his people; for the advance of the white man means to him only what it has meant to all the primitive people who thus have been "discovered"—extermination.

Civilization of "South" Not Wanted.

"Civilization of your kind we do not want," says the Eskimo to the explorer or missionary. "It is good, perhaps, for you and for your countries. It is not good here in the North. We cannot live under it. As we live now so must we live if we are to exist. It is our life; and life is good here among these ice cliffs, when it is lived in our own way. We are content. So have our forefathers lived from time immemorial. And so will we live as long as we remain on earth. Force us to live as you live, make us accept your civilization, and we perish. We have seen it. We know what it does to us. It kills the Eskimo. Leave us to our ways, leave us to our country, or the Eskimo will be wiped off the face of the earth." Such is the Eskimo's reception of the great news. It is something like a shock to our self-satisfaction and opinion that our civilization is best for all people, whether they like it or not.

The Eskimos are essentially a coast race, and it is rare to find a colony of them even as much as sixty miles from the shore. For they have one great and continual problem to face—the question of food. Their bare existence depends on keeping the storehouse filled by trapping and hunting and fishing. For when the long six months' Arctic night sweeps down and blizzards which no man can face and remain alive rage for days—even weeks—at a time, if the tribal larder is empty, the next summer's sun will shine on huts and igloos tenanted only by a few shriveled, skeleton-like forms. It is a case of root, hog, or die.

His house—or igloo, as he calls it—costs him nothing but a little trouble. First, he scoops out a big circle in the snow, eighteen or twenty feet across and two or three feet deep; round this he builds a wall with blocks of ice or frozen snow, gradually sloping inward until the whole has assumed a beehive shape. The cold freezes the blocks together as fast as they are placed in position, and any cracks or crevices are plastered with snow and hermetically sealed. He leaves a small opening in his beehive just large enough to crawl through, and builds on to this a long tunnel-like passage, and at the end he makes a sharp right-angle turn. This is the front door.

Inside the igloo he builds raised sleeping benches, or seats of honor—banks of snow a couple of feet high, covered with skins, the richness and quantity of which depend on his social standing. For light he has small troughs full of blubber or seal oil with a floating wick, and the result is a good deal more comfortable than it may sound. But when a whole family—and possibly a few of the neighbors—have been having a prolonged feast inside, and the tunnel of the front door is packed with snarling, fish-devouring "huskie" dogs, a European visitor might think that a dash of eau-de-cologne would improve the atmosphere.

Mr. and Mrs. Eskimo and Master and Miss Eskimo wear their clothes very much as they wear their skins, and change them about as often. These clothes consist mostly of soft underskins, worn with the fur inside. Then breeches and tunic of heavier, coarser skins, worn fur outermost, and skin boots and moccasins. Their furs are beautifully cured and dressed; the sewing is done with fishbone needles and strong, fine sinews for thread; and some of the embroidery work—especially on the young ladies' tunics—is extremely clever.

The Eskimo is, above all things, a hunter, on both land and sea. If he is going to hunt in his kayak, or small skin boat, he crawls out of his front door with his weapons, calls up the leader of his dog team, and gives him a sound thrashing as a preliminary. This is not done out of cruelty. It is merely as a gentle reminder to the leader that he is in charge of the rest of the team, Mrs. Eskimo and the family in general until the moment of his lord and master's return.

The Eskimo's Daring on Water.

To see an Eskimo in his kayak in a heavy sea is to see an exhibition of the most perfect daring and watermanship conceivable. The kayak is merely a frail framework covered with skins, in shape not unlike an elongated Rob Roy canoe. There is one small opening in the middle, just big enough for him to sit in and paddle, and a skin apron, which he can tie around himself. In this craft he will face a sea that a whaleboat couldn't look it, and to turn completely over and come up again smiling and buoyant is quite a common trick with him. When he is after seal or sea lion in his boat he watches his chance and then throws his harpoon, which has a long rawhide line and a bladder attached. The bladder acts as a drag on the animal's movements, and also acts as a guide for the hunter, enabling him to follow the wounded seal and dispatch it with his lance when it is tired.

Some Eskimos have a very cunning way of harnessing their dogs. Each one of a team of seven, say, is harnessed to a separate trace, and all the traces are of different lengths, the leader's being the longest. He starts off, and the others, seeing him apparently running away, at once give chase to try to nip a bit out of him—each dog tugging at his trace to try and get a chew out of the next ahead; the only result, of course, being that they put in a fine amount of work on the sledge, and the cunning Eskimo goes on his way rejoicing. The leader of the pack has to fight the other dogs, to lick them into order; to hearten up the malingerer on the trail with tooth and claw; to choose the path over dangerous ice; and to safeguard the house in his master's absence. Instances are by no means rare of a team leader, grown old in harness, dying of a broken heart after being denied his place in the traces.

The life of an Eskimo hunter is hard and bitter, but it makes of him the grim, tough, indomitable little man who has helped to carry many white expeditions successfully toward the pole, and to whom many a starving, frozen crew from an ice-nipped whaler owe a debt of gratitude.

BORN—IN WASHINGTON, the AMERICAN BEAUTY ROSE

The admirers of the American Beauty rose are legion; its career of conquest has been well-nigh as wide as that of the American girl herself; yet not one in a thousand of those who have looked with admiration at this queen among flowers realizes that the rose had its birth in the Capital City of the nation, says the Washington Post.

The life of the American Beauty as we know it is only twenty-eight years long. It was not until 1881 that the rechristened blossom was put upon the markets as the American Beauty rose. George Bancroft, the great American historian and diplomatist, stood sponsor for the flower, and the real father of the rose was the distinguished scholar's gardener, John Brady, who is still in Washington.

In addition to his fondness for letters, Mr. Bancroft had a passion for flowers, and during his service as American minister to the newly formed German empire, in the early seventies, he was not only lionized by all the literati of the continent, but was also much sought after by botanists and florists. He visited all the well known gardens of Germany, France and Belgium. He was consulted by all the florists, who presented him with cuttings of their rarest and most valuable flowers. Of roses he had an enormous variety. Most of these he imported to America and planted in the hothouses of his Washington home.

Finding that his collection was outgrowing the limits of his gardens, despite the fact that he was constantly giving specimens away, he transplanted many of his flowers in the garden of his summer home near Newport, R. I., where, up to his death in 1891, he maintained spacious and luxuriant gardens, whose extent and beauty were features of Newport in those days.

His gardener had a hothouse of his own that he used as a sort of overflow meeting of the plants from the Bancroft gardens. He pointed out to Mr. Bancroft the excellence of a certain rose which was fading and which he feared would die. It has been rumored that this plant was first given to the noted historian by the Emperor of Germany, but this has later been denied. To save the plant's life, Brady took it to his own little hothouse, where both he and Mr. Bancroft thought it would have a better chance of living than in the more pretentious establishment of his employer.

This plant was an obscure rosebush at first showing signs of vigor, but rapidly failing from some unaccountable cause. It was said to have been originally a French rose, and this theory of its nationality is borne out by its name, La Madame Ferdinande Jamin. It had found its way to Germany, where it was gradually becoming extinct, and the specimen given to Mr. Bancroft by a prominent Hamburg rose grower is said to have been the only one in existence at the time.

Brady noticed that it bloomed all the year round if properly taken care of, and this he looked upon as a redeeming feature, for here was a rose which would bear flowers at any season of the year, whereas most roses bloom only once a year. Then the gardener's eye was pleased by the rich red color of the blossoms.

After nursing the rosebush carefully Brady succeeded in developing the plant to a fairly hardy state, where the excellent qualities of the rose could be studied. Its large size inspired him to call the attention of a number of gardeners and florists to the Madame Ferdinande Jamin, the beautiful large red rose, with its vigorous thorned stem and its perennial blooming.

Among the local growers to whom Brady showed his prize were two brothers named Field. George Field met Brady in the street one day, in 1881, and offered to buy some roses for him. Field called at Brady's hothouse, and finding that the gardener was not at home, offered to buy some of the plants from his wife. To this offer Mrs. Brady willingly acceded, and he purchased half a dozen of the rose bushes at $3.50 each. Both parties to the exchange were pleased, but there was no pleasure in Brady's mind when he returned home and was told of the sale. He was indignant, and immediately began the "war of the roses," declaring that his wife had thrown away a fortune for a bagatelle. After nearly thirty years of fighting the rival claimants bid fair to carry their contention to the grave.

The verbose name of the forgotten French lady did not please the new owners, so the Fields changed it to that which it now bears. The renaming of the plant was a good stroke, and the title chosen for it was exceedingly happy. Under the tender care of Brady the plant had so developed that the original owners of the Madame Ferdinande Jamin could scarcely have recognized its modern descendant, the American Beauty.

The money they realized was by no means sufficient to make the rose well known and popular. Their market was limited, and after several years of cultivating it they decided to sell the American Beauty to a wealthy promoter who offered to buy the sole rights in it. They sold their every interest in the matchless rose for an amount estimated at $50,000.

The American Beauty, put on the national market in 1886, has maintained unfailingly its unrivaled popularity. Growers and fanciers, amateur and professional, all over the country and Europe sent prepaid orders for as many as they could get. To-day there is no monopoly on the rose and it is for sale by all florists.

SNAKE IN HER WORKBAG.

Mrs. Perry Smith, of Paris, Mo., prepared to do some sewing and went upstairs to the room of her daughter for the latter's workbag. The bag, with the mouth almost drawn to by the gathering string, hung near an open window, and Mrs. Smith sat in a chair and placed it in her lap. One opening the bag she discovered a big blacksnake coiled cozily in the bottom. The snake started to crawl out, but she hit it on the head with her scissors, and then she drew the gathering strings tightly together, carrying Mr. Snake downstairs, and called Mr. Smith to dispatch him, not becoming frightened until all danger had passed. The snake measured four feet in length.

Why do actors so often wear long hair? Perhaps this is the reason: There once was a statute in England under which actors found wandering were liable to be branded through the right ear. The long hair concealed the decoration, and thus the custom was started.

SPAIN'S EXECUTION OF FERRER AND ITS POLITICAL SIGNIFICANCE

PROF. FRANCISCO FERRER.

KING ALFONSO.

The best known Socialist in Europe and the leader of his party in the French Chamber of Deputies is M. Juares, who predicts that the execution in Spain of Prof. Francisco Ferrer, who was convicted of fomenting the recent revolt in Barcelona, will lead to revolution in King Alfonso's domains. The execution of Ferrer has aroused bitter feelings among the Socialists all through Europe, England itself not being an exception, and demonstrations of protest have been made in many cities. In Paris an attempt was made to mob the Spanish embassy and Juares was one of the chief leaders of an angry crowd of 10,000 persons whom the police had difficulty to restrain. That the putting to death of Ferrer was a political mistake on the part of the Spanish government is apparent, for thereby a storm has been raised which it will be difficult to quell.

Ferrer was formerly a director of the Modern School of Barcelona, and was repeatedly accused of teaching revolutionary doctrines. In 1906 he was arrested, charged with complicity with Manuel Morales in the attempt upon the life of King Alfonso, on the day of the royal marriage. On trial Ferrer was acquitted.

On Sept. 1 last he was arrested, charged with having incited the rioting which occurred in Barcelona last summer. This outbreak, which spread through the Catalonian provinces, was in the nature of a protest against the sending of Spanish troops against the Moors on the Riff coast, and for a time assumed alarming proportions. Ferrer was tried by court-martial and found guilty. King Alfonso was appealed to to exercise clemency in his behalf, but refused. He was shot to death at the fortress of Montjuich, in Barcelona.

WHERE THE ELEPHANT IS SACRED

TO AMERICAN merchants Siam is becoming much more than a mere name in the geography. To manufacturers and exporters the land of the sacred elephant is developing as a trade center and wise dealers are learning that there is good opportunity in the Oriental kingdom to sell their products most profitably.

The Siamese are sticklers for goods "as advertised." They will not take anything that is "just as good." They insist upon the original "trade-mark blown in the bottle," and the merchant who attempts to substitute will find his market gone beyond redemption. And this demand extends to the minutest detail.

For many years quinine pills of a certain color, made by an American firm, have been sold by the medical missionaries in the north of Siam, and now the people in that part of the country cannot be induced to take any substitute that differs in the slightest way from what they have been accustomed to buy.

That Siam is developing as a field for all sorts of American products is evidenced by the fact that machine plows made in the United States are finding a profitable market in the kingdom.

Makers of mining machinery and tools of every description will be interested to know that there is likely to be an increasing market for their products. Bordering upon the north of Siam are the Southern Shan States. A company has recently been organized in Burma for the purpose of obtaining certain mineral concessions in these States. These concessions include a prospecting license, conferring the sole right to prospect for minerals and mineral oils for a period of four years, with the option of extending the time for a further period of four years, over an area of about 6,000 square miles. Already the English are alert to the possibilities and British merchants and manufacturers are preparing to invade the territory.

As a commercial prospect for Americans the kingdom of Siam is attractive. The difficulty is with the climate, and only those who are physically fitted to endure a hot climate and Oriental methods of living should risk residence in that place. There is considerable danger of exposure to epidemics. In fact, the danger is so common that it is always to be expected.

12 AMERICAN WOMEN OWN A HALF BILLION

How Will Mrs. Harriman Manage the Great Fortune Recently Left to Her.

MANY CANNOT SPEND INTEREST

Dispose of Large Sums in Various Ways, but Cannot Reduce Their Fortunes.

When Edward H. Harriman, the dead railroad wizard, wrote his famous ninety-four-word will he made his widow the richest among twelve very rich American women, whose wealth totals half a billion dollars. The largest fortunes held by women in this country have been catalogued as follows:

Mrs. E. H. Harriman	$ 85,000,000
Mrs. Hetty Green	83,000,000
Mrs. F. C. Penfield	78,000,000
Mrs. Russell Sage	68,000,000
Mrs. Phoebe Hurst	39,000,000
Mrs. Nonnie Leeds	30,000,000
Mrs. Matilda Ziegler	27,000,000
Mrs. Morris K. Jesup	25,000,000
Miss Helen Gould	24,000,000
Miss Giula Morosini	18,000,000
Mrs. Mary Copley Thaw	12,000,000
Mrs. T. B. Wanamaker	11,000,000
Their total wealth	$500,000,000

Most of Mrs. Harriman's $85,000,000 estate is in stocks, bonds and cash. With one exception the other eleven have put their riches into bonds—low interest bearing, but strong as steel armor.

Rockefeller, the steel trust and other great holders of capital have it invested in huge industries which give employment to hundreds of thousands of men. It draws its profit for the investor, and it gives its added benefit to the public. But in the case of these twelve richest women the money is an intense burden to the world of commerce and trade, and it is also a greater burden to the owners of it.

Take the case of Mrs. Harriman, for instance. A kindly, sweet-faced, elderly woman, schooled more to her home than to society, suddenly finds herself the richest woman in the world.

The mind of one man—Harriman—was sufficient to steer this ship of wealth among the uncharted shoals of Wall street during life. Dead, the minds of many men, lawyers and high financiers, are required to help the widow change her great $85,000,000 estate into low interest bearing securities.

Huge Body of Gold.

Who are these twelve rich women? What do they do with their wealth?

What can they do with it?

Some of these twelve, like Mrs. Sage, Mrs. Hearst and Miss Gould, distribute huge sums in philanthropy. But, try as they will, they cannot give it away as fast as it is increasing. Like a snowball descending a hill, this big body of wealth keeps growing.

This country may have no Bank of England, but in the wealth of its twelve richest women there is a sum of money—a body of gold—that is larger than that bank's resources.

Miss Anne Weightman, daughter of the Philadelphia quinine king, was married to Frederick C. Penfield, an attorney, and the management of her wealth fell upon him. Mrs. Hetty Green turned over to her son for management a big block of her money. Mrs. Green herself doesn't want to see her money decrease. She is the only one of the twelve who has made her money herself. Most of it, too, is invested in good real estate rather than bonds, although she is a heavy bondholder, too.

Mrs. Russell Sage proposed to give most of her fortune away. She founded $20,000,000 of benevolences and found the time it takes to direct them would prevent further gifts at present. Meanwhile her wealth is drawing an income of more than $2,500,000 a year.

Mrs. Phœbe Hearst, widow of the California Senator, has given $7,000,000 to philanthropy and education. She is reported to have sunk a similar sum in her son's newspaper ventures, yet her fortune to-day is greater than ever it was.

Mrs. Nonnie Leeds bought in Paris a black pearl which even King Edward VII. could not afford. Her expenditures on gems have been enormous, without any decrease in her income.

Mrs. Matilda Ziegler and Mrs. Morris K. Jessup both were left legacies by men who in life have been noted for charity. They have continued the work of their husbands, but their wealth continues automatically.

Miss Helen Gould has devoted her life to expending Jay Gould's gift to her of $18,000,000. Her benefactions are scattered over the United States, but she is wealthier every year.

Best Dressed Woman.

The best dressed woman of these twelve rich women is Miss Giula Morosini, who spends more than $100,000 a year for gowns. All her dresses and the blooded horses she owns can't begin to stop the golden flood that pours in on her every interest day.

One woman alone of these twelve—the black-clothed figure of Mrs. Mary Copley Thaw—has found that her money brought her sadness. The troubles of her son have taken much of her wealth, but the $10,000,000 that William Thaw willed her has grown to $12,000,000.

Mrs. Thomas B. Wanamaker will find herself forth $20,000,000 within ten years, if her income grows as it has done.

Does this half billion, which is mounting higher and higher every year, constitute a menace to the country? Or does it give it a stability that the banks lack, by reason of that vast horde of gold, which no one spends, nor no one cares to spend?

Only the future can tell.

Soldier True to Training.

During the period of the "second empire" in France the "Cent Gardes" were one of its sights at the Tuilleries. It was hard to distinguish them from statutes. Their commander, Col. Verly, once declared to Empress Eugenie that "nothing" could make one of his men move when on duty. The empress laid a wager that she would make one of the giants stir; so, with her characteristic impetuosity she went up to one of the guards and boxed his ears. Not a muscle moved. The empress then acknowledged that Col. Verly had won the bet, and sent a solatium to the soldier, who, however, proudly refused it, saying that he had been sufficiently compensated by the honor of having had his sovereign lady's hand laid on his cheek.

Headquarters for the Juice.

Once upon a time a child who was asked upon an examination paper to define a mountain range replied, "A large sized cook stove." The same method of reasoning seems to go with older growth. A recent examination paper at the Sheffield Scientific School at Yale contained the question, "What is the office of the gastric juice?" And the answer on the paper said, "The stomach."—Cleveland Leader.

Sounded Like an Echo.

"Some day," shrieked the militant suffragette, "the women of this country will rise in a body and seize the reins of power! Keep your eyes and ears open!"

"'Ere's 'opin'!" heartily exclaimed a slightly inebriated man in the audience.

SAVED FROM AN OPERATION

By Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound

Louisville, Ky.—"Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound has certainly done me a world of good and I cannot praise it enough. I suffered from irregularities, dizziness, nervousness, and a severe female trouble. Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound has restored me to perfect health and kept me from the operating table. I will never be without this medicine in the house."—Mrs. Sam'l Lee, 3523 Fourth St., Louisville, Ky.

Another Operation Avoided.

Adrian, Ga.—"I suffered untold misery from female troubles, and my doctor said an operation was my only chance, and I dreaded it almost as much as death. Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound completely cured me without an operation."—Lena V. Henry, R. F. D. 3.

Thirty years of unparalleled success confirms the power of Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound to cure female diseases. The great volume of unsolicited testimony constantly pouring in proves conclusively that Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound is a remarkable remedy for those distressing feminine ills from which so many women suffer.

A Verbal Speedometer.

Every calling has its technical vocabulary, and those who are familiar with it are often surprised and irritated at the difficulty other people have in understanding it. A writer in the New York World tells of an old horseman down in Maine who had run over a man, and was being sued for damages.

The court asked the defendant if he was driving fast. He answered: "I was going a pace." The court then said: "Now, kindly tell the gentlemen of the jury just how fast you were going."

"Well," said the defendant, "I reckon I was going a clip."

"Well, will you tell the jury how fast a clip is?"

"Well, it's going a dite."

"Now, will you tell the jury how fast a dite is?"

"Well, a dite's a dite. Anybody knows what a dite is."

Tact.

"I am sorry to have to tell you so, boys," said the pleasant looking visitor who was addressing the Sunday school, "but there is not one chance in a thousand that any one of you ever will be President of the United States."

Still he failed to secure their undivided attention.

"But if you live up to your opportunities," he went on, eyeing them keenly, "some bright boy in this audience may become a great baseball pitcher or the world's champion batsman."

Instantly every boy sat up straight and began to listen.—Chicago Tribune.

Deafness Cannot be Cured

by local applications, as they cannot reach the diseased portion of the ear. There is only one way to cure deafness, and that is by constitutional remedies. Deafness is caused by an inflamed condition of the mucous lining of the Eustachian Tube. When this tube is inflamed you have a rumbling sound or imperfect hearing, and when it is entirely closed, Deafness is the result, and unless the inflammation can be taken out and this tube restored to its normal condition, hearing will be destroyed forever; nine cases out of ten are caused by Catarrh, which is nothing but an inflamed condition of the mucous surfaces.

We will give One Hundred Dollars for any case of Deafness (caused by Catarrh) that cannot be cured by Hall's Catarrh Cure. Send for circulars, free.

Before 1850 most English railway carriages had only four wheels, and weighed ten tons. From 1850 to 1890 they had six wheels, and weighed fifteen or sixteen tons; from 1890 to 1900 they had eight wheels, and weighed twenty-four tons; and since 1900 the fashion is twelve wheels for dining and sleeping cars, and the weight is thirty-five to forty-two tons.

Wants Jury of His Peers.

"I have been engaged in the practice of law a good many years," said S. S. Urmy, police judge of Topeka, Kan., "and about the most humorous thing I ever saw in a courtroom was in Topeka.

"One day an old negro man was being tried in the justice court—that was before the office of police judge was created—and he demanded a trial by a jury of his peers. He could neither read nor write, and his lawyer insisted that the jury, to be his peers, as required by the law, must be unable to read or write, too. To avoid disputes I agreed to it, but we had a time finding twelve men in Topeka who could neither read nor write. But we did find them, and the case went to trial.

"Before the jury retired I took two pieces of paper and wrote 'guilty' on one piece and 'not guilty' on the other and instructed the foreman of the jury to destroy the one he did not wish to be used and to return the other to me when the jury had reached a verdict. The jury was out only a few minutes, when it came in. The foreman handed me a piece of paper with the word 'guilty' written on it.

"'Well, gentlemen, you find him guilty, do you?' I asked.

"'No, sah, jedge, no, sah, we done found him not guilty,' spoke up one of the jurymen. Then he added with disgust: 'I tole that fool nigger he was tearin' up the wrong piece of paper.'"—Kansas City Star.

What has become of the old-fashioned woman who rolled her work apron in a bundle, and went over to a neighbor's to spend the day?

THE DIFFERENCE.

Coffee Usually Means Sickness, but Postum Always Means Health.

Those who have never tried the experiment of leaving off coffee and drinking Postum in its place and in this way regaining health and happiness can learn much from the experience of others who have made the trial.

One who knows says: "I drank coffee for breakfast every morning until I had terrible attacks of indigestion producing days of discomfort and nights of sleeplessness. I tried to give up the use of coffee entirely, but found it hard to go from hot coffee to a glass of water. Then I tried Postum.

"It was good and the effect was so pleasant that I soon learned to love it and have used it for several years. I improved immediately after I left off coffee and took on Postum and am now entirely cured of my indigestion and other troubles all of which were due to coffee. I am now well and contented and all because I changed from coffee to Postum.

"Postum is much easier to make right every time than coffee, for it is so even and always reliable. We never use coffee now in our family. We use Postum and are always well."

"There's a reason" and it is proved by trial.

FARM AND GARDEN

For Cream Test Balance.

A simple and sensitive weighing instrument to be known as the Wisconsin hydrostatic cream balance has been devised at the agricultural experiment station of the University of Wisconsin. This instrument meets the long recognized need for a simple and accurate method of weighing cream in the Babcock test bottle for testing. The ordinary cheap scales are inaccurate, and the more delicate balances are too expensive for general use by farmers.

CREAM BALANCE.

The new invention consists of a specially devised brass float, similar to a hydrometer, which is placed in a cylinder of water. The instrument floats steadily in a vertical position, and supports a platform on which a cream bottle and a nine-gram weight are are placed. Small, one tenth gram weights are placed on the platform until the float sinks to a line marked on the spindle. The nine-gram weight is then put into the bottle with a pipette in a sufficient amount to again sink the float to a line of the spindle. This gives the weight accurately and the devise is so sensitive that it is affected by a single drop of cream. The weighing can be done rapidly, however.

Skim Milk.

At the West Virginia experiment station it has been found that skim milk for feeding laying hens is worth from 1½ to 2 cents a quart. Other experiments have fully proved that it has equally as great value for feeding pigs.

Figuring at this rate, the milkman who sells whole milk is selling from 60 to 80 cents' worth of skim milk to each can, and the general market prices of a can of milk is close around $1.25. Now, this can of milk contains enough cream to make four pounds of butter, which is worth about $1, leaving only about 25 cents for the skim milk sold, or a loss of from 35 to 55 cents on each can over making the cream into butter and feeding the skim milk. Also, when the milk is fed on the farm more fertilizer is made, which makes the difference still greater in favor of keeping and feeding the skim milk.

Where ine can secure select trade for whole milk at extra price it will pay to sell the whole milk and buy extra feeds and fertilizers, but selling whole milk at less than $1 for a 40-quart can is not profitable when one considers the future of the land on which he is dairying.

New Corn Feeding.

Not all farmers appreciate the value of feeding new corn. When handled properly more good results can be obtained from it than from any other crop grown. When fed in the green stage, from the time when grains are in the milk till they become hard and the blades dry up, horses and cattle will eat almost, if not all, of the entire plant, and sheep and hogs will eat much of it, utilizing to advantage all there is in the crop. New corn, just after it has passed the roasting ear stage, is one of the best feeds for poultry, both young and old, and hens will lay eggs much better than on old corn. There is no feed much better for fattening horses and colts, as well as cattle, than new corn.

We always plant some very early, medium and the patches of corn to be cut and fed whole in late summer and fall. In this way we have the best of feed for the stock in August, September and October, one-fourth of the year. While the new corn is being fed none of the stock requires much other feed, and the grain in the bin and the hay in the mow are saved.

Fall Plowing.

Whether it is profitable to plow in fall or not depends on the soil and climate. If the soil is of a firm texture fall planting will do it good, where the winter is severe enough to keep the ground frozen until spring. It separates the soil and makes it friable. But where the soil is of a tough clay texture and the winters are mild, not freezing the ground solid for a foot or more in depth, the plowed ground will freeze and thaw and run together again and be as firm in the spring as though not plowed. If any good comes from such fall plowing it must be weed destruction.

Water and Air in Soil.

There must be a proper balance of air and water to have the soil work go on. Exclude either and there is failure. Soil work is stopped when the soil becomes so dry that the water films around the soil particles are destroyed. Then is when the plant food ceases to be elaborated, and what plant food there is in the soil is no longer carried to the roots of the plants.

Great losses in crops are annually recorded because these simple fundamental facts are not fully understood. There must be a balance. Drainage will often do much to bring about a good condition of aeration of soil; but in some soils something else is needed. Thus a sandy soil that is so light that the moisture film soon disappears to a depth of a foot or more will produce nothing. In such a case other things must be incorporated with the sand of the soil, such as muck, lime, humus, fertilizer, to give it the power to retain the moisture film.

Dairying in Winter.

There are many advantages in having cows come fresh in winter, when all dairy products sell at a high price. In many places the price of butter is from 25 to 50 per cent higher in winter than in summer.

When the cows calve in the spring they generally milk well until the pastures dry up, when the flow of milk quickly falls off, so that by the time stable feeds begin the cows are almost dried up. Now, if the cows come fresh in the fall, they produce a good flow of milk during the winter months, and in the spring, when they are turned on the grass, this acts as a second freshening and thus lengthens the period of milk production.

Another distinct advantage in winter dairying is that during this season the farmer is not so busy with other work, consequently he can give more time to the care of the cows, the milk and the cream than is possible during the busy season of the year. When winter dairying becomes more generally practiced, the subject of winter feeds will be given more attention. Of these silage is one of the most important, since one acre of good silage material will yield as much feed as three acres of pasture.

Wasteful Economy.

The number of people is small, we believe, who, knowing that through their fault some mistake of an injurious nature has been made, would want only to attach the blame to innocent parties. This is generally done thoughtlessly and ignorantly, albeit in good faith. The idea is to examine ourselves and methods before condemning another.

A patron of a Wisconsin creamery recently sent in some vigorous protests against its products. It transpired that the creamery was not in the wrong, except so far as the management put faith in a few of the patrons of the creamery. Several of them had thoughtlessly turned their herds into cabbage, rape and turnip patches immediately after the first heavy frosts, and the milk thus tainted was sent in, with the result of causing inferiority in the creamery's output.

Aside from the fact that we should not judge too hastily or be too ready to charge moral turpitude, the discerning farmer will understand from the case in point that feeding the stock any old thing to prevent waste may be the means of producing greater destruction.

Forms of Combs.

No matter how poultry may excel in shape, color, and size, a malformed comb and bad lobes will detract from the chances of success, especially in the non-sitting or Mediterranean breeds, where the ornamental headgear, or comb, is so conspicuously attractive. There are many kinds of combs, as will be seen in the accompanying illustrations, which are deserving of notice, chief of which are the single serrated comb, as seen in such breeds as Minorcas, Leghorns, Orpingtons, Plymouth Rocks, Langshans, Dorking, in different sizes; the rose-comb, beautifully worked or corrugated, and full of small points, as seen chiefly in the Redcap, Hamburg, and Wyandotte family. Then there is the pea comb, or triple comb, that is, three parallel ridges (or very small combs), as seen in the Brahman or the Indian Game.

Get Rid of Burdock.

Any of the fields full of burdock? If this pest has a good start it will spread all over the farm by the end of another season. Easy to kill it. The burdock only lives a couple of years if frequently mowed off close to the ground, but the best way is to take an iron bar, drive it down deeply by the side of the root and pry the whole miserable thing out and burn it, root and branch. Every plant thus treated is dead and done for.

Farm Notes.

Get busy with the wobbly colt and teach him that you are his friend and master. It will be easy.

The average ewe requires from 3 to 5 pounds of salt a year, the variation depending largely upon the amount of natural salts contained in the pastures.

Cut out and burn all dead and diseased branches of fruit trees and bushes as soon as they are detected. Often the removal of a diseased branch will save the whole tree and save others from becoming infected.

It is a mark of poor farm management to allow any animals to become infected with lice. Hogs can not thrive when their vitality is sucked away by these insects. There are several good dips on the market, and kerosene and grease, mixed warm, is a good common remedy.

The bees should have plenty of water. They consume a great deal, and will travel a long distance to get it. Should there be no running stream or lake of pure water near, it is well to place a pail of fresh water near the apiary every day. Water is used by the bees to dilute the heavy, thicky honey left over from winter to make it suitable for the young larvae and also to make the cell wax pliable.

THE HOUSEHOLD

Handy Chopping Knife.

No, this is not a bird cage in the illustration. It is a chopping knife designed by a Colorado man and a strong and effective implement it is. The blades, as will be observed, are circular and are attached to the handle by heavy arms. When this tool is brought down on a piece of meat or a head of cabbage it speedily converts the objects into shreds. In most cases chopping knives are made with single, or at best, double blades. It will be readily seen that a circular blade will do much more work than one or two straight ones. Another use for this cutter is in cutting the dough for doughnuts, cookies or other circular cakes, though in ordinary round cakes the inside ring will form the cake while the hoop of dough that is left can either be baked into a hoop of cake or the leftover dough can be rolled again and the cutting continued till all is used up, as is usually done.

CHOPPING KNIFE.

Apple Snow.

Peel and grate two large apples and put them aside. Whip stiff the whites of two eggs with a pinch of salt, then add gradually six tablespoonsful of sugar, beating it well into the egg, alternating with a tablespoonful of the apple till all the sugar and apple are used. Continue to whip until the snow has arisen to some height. If preferred the pulp of cooked apples may be used, and the snow may be quickly and lightly browned.

Almond Cheese Cakes.

One-quarter pound sweet almonds, 6 bitter almonds, one-quarter pound loaf sugar, 1 tablespoonful of cream, whites of 2 eggs, puff paste. Blanch and pound the sweet and bitter almonds with a tablespoon of water, then add the sugar, cream and whites of eggs. Mix as quickly as possible. Put in very small patty pans lined with puff paste. Bake in warm oven twenty minutes.

Apple Cheese.

Apple cheese makes a good tart or cake filling. Peel, core and quarter half of a pound of apples and grate the rind of a medium-sized lemon. Place a pound of sugar in an earthenware pan with a quarter of a pint of water, and add the apples and lemon. Simmer this for about an hour, then add the juice of two lemons and let it boil for ten minutes, stirring continually.

Stewed Prunes.

Wash the prunes well, put in a kettle, just cover with cold water and let stand all night. In the morning put on the stove in the same water. Let simmer gently until tender. Do not stir or mash them. Cook on the back of the stove until the juice is a thick sirup and very little of it. When cold eat with cream.

Caramel Cake.

Cream a half-cup of butter with one and one-half cups of powdered sugar. When this mixture is light, add three-quarters of a cup of milk, and when this is well beaten in, fold in the stiffened whites of three eggs alternately, with enough prepared flour to make a good batter. Bake in layers.

Apples with Bread and Milk.

A delicious luncheon dish is made by slicing perfectly ripe mellow sweet apples into a bowl of rich milk and bread. The more common way is to bake the apples, unpeeled, in a slow oven till tender, then slicing into the bread and milk; but many on trial prefer the uncooked fruit.

Onions in Potato Cradles.

Left-over potatoes of uniform size may be cut in half lengthwise, the centers scooped out, leaving a shell. This should be browned in butter, then filled with fried onions. Hot butter peas may substitute for onions.

Short Suggestions.

Allow mush to bake in the pot in which it is made, then scrape the rough edges out.

Cream cheese mixed with canned currants or jellied cranberries makes a good sandwich filling.

Coal soot is easily removed from tin articles or porcelain if they are first coated with kerosene.

You will find a clean paint brush valuable in cleaning sandy dried peaches. Wash them several times.

A few drops of alcohol rubbed on the inside of lamp chimneys will remove all trace of greasy smoke when water alone is of no avail.

An ordinary polish for silverware is made of alcohol and whiting. It will also serve excellently for polishing plate glass and mirrors.

Small cold cream jars and the like, if scalded, make excellent containers for jelly which at some time or other you will desire to place in a lunch basket.

A neglected grate or one which has been red hot should be rubbed over with a cut raw potato before it is blackleaded. The result will be a brilliant polish.

Do not scrape cooking utensils of any kind. Clean them out as much as possible, fill with water and washing soda, cover and allow them to steam. They will then clean easily.

Mend leaky enameled ware with white lead. Cover the small holes with white lead on the outside of the vessel; for larger holes cut a piece of white lawn or muslin a little larger than the hole and pull through on the inside of vessel and apply the white lead on the outside. Place in the sun or near the stove to dry.

RASH ALL OVER BODY.

Awful, Crusted, Weeping Eczema on Little Sufferer—A Score of Treatments Prove Dismal Failures—Cure Achieved by Cuticura.

"My little boy had an awful rash all over his body and the doctor said it was eczema. It was terrible and used to water awfully. Any place the water went it would form another sore and it would become crusted. A score or more physicians failed utterly and dismally in their efforts to remove the trouble. Then I was told to use the Cuticura Remedies. I got a cake of Cuticura Soap, a box of Cuticura Ointment and a bottle of Cuticura Resolvent, and before we had used half the Resolvent I could see a change in him. In about two months he was entirely well. George L. Lambert, 139 West Centre St., Mahanoy City, Pa., Sept. 26 and Nov. 4, 1907."

A Clean Man

Outside cleanliness is less than half the battle. A man may scrub himself a dozen times a day, and still be unclean. Good health means cleanliness not only outside, but inside. It means a clean stomach, clean bowels, clean blood, a clean liver, and new, clean, healthy tissues. The man who is clean in this way will look it and act it. He will work with energy and think clean, clear, healthy thoughts.

He will never be troubled with liver, lung, stomach or blood disorders. Dyspepsia and indigestion originate in unclean stomachs. Blood diseases are found where there is unclean blood. Consumption and bronchitis mean unclean lungs.

Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery

prevents these diseases. It makes a man's insides clean and healthy. It cleans the digestive organs, makes pure, clean blood, and clean, healthy flesh.

It restores tone to the nervous system, and cures nervous exhaustion and prostration. It contains no alcohol or habit-forming drugs.

Constipation is the most unclean uncleanliness. Dr. Pierce's Pleasant Pellets cure it. They never gripe. Easy to take as candy.

Raising Temperature

depends upon the heater—how constructed—whether it gets all the fuel-energy or only some of it.

If the heater is a

HOME ENDORSEMENT

Hundreds of Butler Citizens Can Tell You All About It

Home endorsement, the public expression of Butler people, should be evidence beyond dispute for every Butler reader. Surely the experience of friends and neighbors, cheerfully given by them, will carry more weight than the utterances of strangers residing in far away places. Read the following:

A. M. Madison, Oak Street, Butler, Ind., says: "About a year ago a steady dull ache across the small of my back began to bother me. As I had often heard Doan's Kidney Pills highly spoken of, I resolved to try them and procured a box at Stone's drug store. They proved very effective and after I had taken them a short time, my trouble had disappeared. I have no hesitation whatever in endorsing this excellent remedy."

For sale by all dealers. Price 50 cents. Foster-Milburn Co., Buffalo, New York, sole agents for the United States.

Remember the name—Doan's—and take no other. 47-2

The old, old story, told times without number, and repeated over and over again for the last 36 years, but it is always a welcome story to those in search of health—There is nothing in the world that cures coughs and colds as quickly as Chamberlain's Cough Remedy. Sold by Geo. W. Geddes. 44-1m

M. F. Moore, Druggist

A druggist at Westmoreland, Kans., M. F. Moore by name, writes that he can get affidavits from customers saying that they were cured of chronic constipation, indigestion, etc., by the use of Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin, the great laxative and tonic. He says further, that he has been a druggist for 25 years, but has never known of a better remedy for these troubles than Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin, which he also uses in his own family. It is absolutely guaranteed to do all that is claimed, and if you want to try it before buying, send your address for a free sample bottle to Pepsin Syrup Co., 119 Caldwell Bldg., Monticello, Ill. DEMOCRACY AND THE LIQUOR QUESTION

W. J. Bryan Makes a Bold Statement and Defines His Position on the Liquor Question

A few self-authorized leaders of the democratic party in DeKalb county have sent out the word that to be a loyal democrat you must vote for the return of the saloons.

They practically say in their Waterloo organ that it may not be necessary for every democrat to be a liquor seller, but every democrat must array himself on the side of the brewer and distiller. This is the test by which party fealty is measured.

How do the respectable democrats like this?

Is it possible that any sane democrat can believe that the great party that has produced the greatest statesmen in this nation has degenerated into an annex to the bar room?

Democrats of DeKalb county, what do you think about this?

Are you going to take as your leader the notorious Taggart of French Lick fame, or will you follow that clear-brained and eloquent leader, William J. Bryan?

Will you, as good democrats, line up with the modern Puritan, Governor Thomas Marshall, or will you follow the black standard of the Steve Flemings, of Fort Wayne?

Are you ready to line up with men of the ability and standing of Mr. Boland, of Auburn, or do you want to follow men of the Ab Kelley type?

Democrats of DeKalb county, will you heed the warning words of men like Herman D. Boozer, of Waterloo, or do you want to march under the leadership of the Hathaways, Nimmons and Nusbaums?

Democrats of DeKalb county, do you want character, sobriety and ability in your party leaders, or will you follow the saloon men in their selfish desire to sacrifice our party for rum, riot and ruin?

W. J. Bryan, the greatest living democrat, who polled more votes than any presidential candidate the party has ever had, last week defined his position on the liquor question. We clip from the Commoner:

"The liquor dealers, recognizing that their very obvious pecuniary interest would lessen the weight of any argument which they might publicly advance, are making their fight under cover of organization purporting to represent those who use liquor. Many well meaning men have been misled into believing that every attempt to lessen the evils of intemperance is a 'financial attack' on 'personal liberty.'

"It is time the phrase 'personal liberty' were defined. What is meant by 'personal liberty'?

"Does it mean that a person has a right to drink in any quantity, any time and any place, no matter what injury he may inflict upon others? If not, with whom rests the right to fix limitations?

"A drunken man is a menace to the lives and property of those about him; have his neighbors no right to protect themselves?

"A drunkard robs his wife and children, and he may finally make his family and himself a charge upon society. Has society no right to protect itself?

"The saloon is next of kin to the brothel and the gambling hall; it is a rendezvous for the criminal element and willing tool of corrupt politicians. Has not the body politic a right to protect itself from the demoralization which the saloon works?

"The right to drink does not necessarily include the right to demand the establishment of a saloon. The right to drink is sufficiently protected by any arrangement that permits the reasonable use of liquor under reasonable conditions; and it must be remembered that the right to drink, like any other right, can be forfeited. Nothing is more sacred than the right to life, and yet one may forfeit his right to life if he uses it in such a way as to threaten the life of another. So, the man who drinks to excess may forfeit the right to drink in moderation if not content with reasonable regulation, he insists that liquor shall be sold under conditions that constitute a menace to the home and the state.

"The man who desires to drink moderately ought to join with those who seek to reduce the evils of drink to the lowest possible point, instead of allaying himself with those who ignore the evils of intemperance and resist every effort put forth for the protection of society."

The Twilight of Life

The muscles of the stomach in old age are not as strong or active as in youth and in consequence old people are very subject to constipation and indigestion. Many seldom have a bowel movement without artificial aid. Many, also, have unpleasant eructations of gas from the stomach after eating. All this can be avoided by the use of Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin, which permanently regulates the bowels so that passages come naturally, and so strengthens the stomach that food is digested without discomfort. It is absolutely guaranteed to do what is claimed, and if you want to try it before buying, send your address for a free sample bottle to Pepsin Syrup Co., 119 Caldwell Bldg., Monticello, Ill. It is sold by all druggists at 50c and $1 a bottle. 44-1m

TAXES PAID BY DEKALB COUNTY SALOONS

Pauper Expenses

The liquor element is crying out so loudly concerning the taxes that the saloons of DeKalb county paid while said saloons were running that we desire to turn the searchlight on these claims.

For the year ending March 1, 1907, forty-one liquor licenses were issued in DeKalb county. All their owners were supposed to be visited by the tax assessor and their stock and fixtures assessed for the purposes of taxation in the year, 1908.

Seven of these saloonkeepers either did not get on the tax list at all or else failed to give in any saloon stock and fixtures to the assessors. The thirty-four remaining saloons give in stock, fixtures, eating rooms, cash registers, etc., valued at a total of $9,231. This was divided as follows: Eight Auburn saloons, $2,350; Garrett, eleven saloons, $2,730; six Butler saloons, $1,350; five saloons in Waterloo, $890; three in Ashley had $641, and one in Auburn Junction whose stock and fixtures were valued at $315.

The entire taxable property of De Kalb county is in the neighborhood of $16,000,000. Thus it can be seen that only a little over one-half a mill of each dollar of taxable property in DeKalb county was saloon property. These thirty-four saloons should have paid $241.69 taxes—a very small sum, and one which is more than equalled by many a taxpayer in DeKalb county. However, $74 59 of this small amount went delinquent and is still unpaid. Thus, from the thirty-four saloons of DeKalb county in 1908, were paid only $167.10 for saloon stock, fixtures, eating rooms, etc.

Aside from their license fees these saloons paid almost nothing. The $4,100 in county licenses is more than overbalanced by a single item of expense to the county, 90 per cent of which is caused by the saloons. That one item is the cost of the county poor farm. The new infirmary had just been erected at a cost of $30,000 Three hundred and twenty acres of land belong to the county, on which the infirmary is located. This land with its improvements is worth $30,000. This sum, added to the cost of the infirmary, makes a total of $60,000, which, placed at 6 per cent interest, amounts to $3,600 a year. In addition to this the county is taxed $4,000 a year for the care of its county poor. This makes a total cost for the county poor of $7,600; 90 per cent of this is $6,840. $4,100 of county license fees deducted from the $6,840 leaves $2,740—the amount the saloon has cost the county, in one item alone, annually, over and above what the saloons pays in revenue. This does not take into account jurors and bailiff fees, the board of criminals, the cost of the insane and the cost of the township poor, a large per cent of which is traceable directly to the liquor traffic.

Mr. Taxpayer, if you want to reduce your taxes, vote "Yes" in favor of prohibiting the saloons in DeKalb county. LOCAL OPTION LEAGUE.

POPE STUDYING ENGLISH.

Growing Influence of Catholic Church in America the Cause.

Pope Pius X. has taken up the study of English. During a visit of Mgr. Kennedy, rector of the American College, to the Vatican, his holiness informed the bishop that he has been studying the English language lately, but as yet is not able to speak it, writes a Rome correspondent. Since his election to the papacy his inability to speak English has been a source of regret to Pius X. However, as he said he never thought he should have any need of it, but realizing the drawbacks, is making up for lost time.

No one who visits Rome now can fail to recognize the growing influence of the English speaking church here. Father Phelan of St. Louis spoke of it when he was here on his recent visit, and the announcement just made of the withdrawal of the United States from the jurisdiction of the propaganda further accentuates the changed conditions.

Few stop to think of the number of the cardinals who now have personal knowledge of the growth and influence of the Catholic church in the United States. In addition to the powerful secretary of state, Cardinal Merry Del Val, those who have been in the United States include the former Delegates Satolli and Martinelli, Logue, Gibbons and the Spanish monk Vives y. Tuto, a man of great influence, who was, in his earlier days, a missionary and came very near locating in Cincinnati. Cardinal Gotti, the head of the propaganda, was for several years in Brazil.

A new mark of consideration is the announcement that the Pope has designated Cardinal Vincenzo Vannutelli to preside at the Eucharistic Congress in London the second week in September, and that he is to have the rank of an apostolic legate.

It is expected to be the greatest gathering of churchmen the English speaking people have had in centuries. Seven cardinals and a legion of bishops will be present. Cardinal Gibbons, Archbishop Farley of New York and Bishop Maes of Covington, Ky., are among the American prelates who will be prominent in the proceedings. They will come to Rome after it is over and be here for the beatification of three new saints and the consistory to be held early in November.

It is at this meeting of the cardinals that the long-anticipated bestowal of the new red hats for the United States probably will be made.

HOTELS READY FOR THE RUSH

All the Hostelries, Big and Little, Are Prepared for the Coming of the Land and Exposition Guests.

"Chicago is not going to be caught unprepared for the big crowds that will attend the Land and Irrigation Exposition," is the report given by a leading hotel manager. "We have been keeping our ear to the ground, and we hear reports from every direction that we are going to be surprised by the number of guests on account of the 'novel show' at the Coliseum, Nov. 20 to Dec. 4. Of course, we always expect a big attendance at the Live Stock Show, which occurs on the same dates, but we shall have a crowd that will surpass anything seen in many years when the doors of the Land and Irrigation Exposition are thrown open on Nov. 20. Every hotel in Chicago is looking forward to this event and is prepared to see its capacity packed to the full by a class of visitors who do not often get in Chicago.

"This Land Exposition has a different sort of pull from the other big offairs that are held at the Coliseum from time to time. We appreciate the fact that we are going to have a very substantial class of visitors on this occasion and that they will come from many states.

"According to the plans of the exposition, it will be a great educational event and enable the land seeker to save money by having concentrated under one roof all the leading regions of the country where life is made attractive by irrigation and an agreeable climate and productive soil. You may tell all prospective visitors that we are ready for them and for them to come and enjoy this feast which Chicago has spread."

The theater managers are also making preparations for special attractions during the exposition period. They will also take steps to be rid of the ticket scalpers and speculators who often interfere with patrons of the theater and prevent them from getting seats at the regular prices.

"We shall do our part to entertain the exposition visitors in a fitting manner," said one of the prominent theater managers, speaking for all of the prominent theaters.

THE GRAND CANYON IN OIL

The Grand Canyon of the Yellowstone river will be represented in a painting covering 3,000 square feet of surface at the north end of the gallery in the Coliseum during the Land and Irrigation Exposition, which begins Nov. 20. The Yellowstone Park is the mother of several great rivers that are now used for irrigation and the subject is a very fitting one for such an occasion. This will be the largest reproduction of the famous canyon ever shown. Thousands of electric lights will give the effect of water flowing through the canyon and will show in the perspective the living waterfall, which in reality is 1,000 feet high.

Better Not Get Dyspepsia

If you can help it. Kodol prevents Dyspepsia, by effectually helping Nature to Relieve Indigestion. But don't trifle with Indigestion.

A great many people who have trifled with indigestion, have been sorry for it—when nervous or chronic dyspepsia resulted, and they have not been able to cure it.

Use Kodol and prevent having Dyspepsia.

Everyone is subject to indigestion. Stomach derangement follows stomach abuse, just as naturally and just as surely as a sound and healthy stomach results upon the taking of Kodol.

When you experience sourness of stomach, belching of gas and nauseating fluid, bloated sensation, gnawing pain in the pit of the stomach, heart burn (so-called), diarrhoea, headaches, dullness or chronic tired feeling—you need Kodol. And then the quicker you take Kodol—the better. Eat what you want, let Kodol digest it.

Ordinary pepsin "dyspepsia tablets," physics, etc., are not likely to be of much benefit to you, in digestive ailments. Pepsin is only a partial digester—and physics are not digesters at all.

Kodol is a perfect digester. If you could see Kodol digesting every particle of food, of all kinds, in the glass test-tubes in our laboratories, you would know this just as well as we do.

Nature and Kodol will always cure a sick stomach—but in order to be cured, the stomach must rest. That is what Kodol does—rests the stomach, while the stomach gets well. Just as simple as A, B, C.

Our Guarantee

Go to your druggist today and get a dollar bottle. Then after you have used the entire contents of the bottle if you can honestly say, that it has not done you any good, return the bottle to the druggist and he will refund your money without question or delay. An average of eight new churches built every day in this country, as statistics show to have been the case for the past twenty years, indicates that there is little reason to be pessimistic regarding the religious future of America. Moreover, church-membership is growing faster than the population.

Between 1864, when the coinage of the two-cent piece was authorized, and 1873, when it was discontinued, over forty-eight million coins of that denomination were issued, and only seventeen million have been returned to the United States Treasury. What has become of the remaining thirty million and more—for very rarely is a two-cent piece now seen in circulation? The problem of where the pins go is not the only one of its kind.

Much interest is felt in the report of the Biblical Commission which the Pope appointed some years ago to formulate the position of the Roman Church on the question of the historical character of the early chapters of Genesis, and the general subject of Scriptural criticism. The necessity of adhering to the established doctrines of the church is of course insisted upon, but there are some apparent concessions to modern interpretations of Biblical language. For instance, it is held that the account of the creation given in Genesis was intended to be suited to the popular comprehension, and it is not by its very nature accurate in the scientific sense of the word. It is therefore quite permissible to think of the "days" of Genesis as a longer and indefinite period of time. On points not directly settled by the judgment of the church or the interpretation of the fathers, the defense of individual opinion is lawful.

The satirist has had a pleasant time mocking this age wherein men affect a leaning for clothes of dull grays and browns and blacks and yet delight to parade periodically in uniform cloth and gold lace. They joke of the staid and unassuming citizen of daylight hours who is thrilled by night to be addressed as "high worshipful master" or "exalted potentate of the universe." The color sense is merely held in taut. The weakness for title is pandered in secret. After all there is no need for the shamefacedness over a taste for things that are bright and beautiful in this world. Life to the one who has lived rightly and healthfully and with joy in his heart is a pageant. To him everything is illumined and interesting and he can but grieve that any one should deny the need of color and form. How much more picturesque our streets might be if at least some small part of the gorgeousness in which the city or villages indulges in in times of festivity could be a part of the daily parade. We know that, living as we do in a cleaner and more comfortable period, the clothes of the ancients we copy and admire could make a braver show now. For history tells us that though the last king of the house of Valois wore violet velvet he powdered and rouged. The lace of Louis XIV. was stained. The husband whom La Grande Madamoiselle took, somewhat against his will, was described as "well-dressed and dowdy." Men may shortly become a little more frank in the matter of their attire, admitting that the gay and airy and bizarre is not necessarily to be condemned, but rather to be presented as the public confession of a cheerful spirit.

From the earliest days the lure of the unknown has been something mankind could not resist. To travel in new lands and sail uncharted seas to go where no one had gone before, to find what others had sought in vain—this has always stirred the blood of the race, and has led its bolder spirits into the perils and the achievements of great adventures. Such things as the search for the Golden Fleece and the quest of the Holy Grail gave expression to this before the great era of discovery and exploration, and in more modern times there has been the splendid struggle to wrest the final secret from the frozen north. Now that this last goal has been attained, there is little left, geographically speaking, to stir the imagination of men; but this is far from meaning that the realm of the unknown is all explored, or that the lure of its mysteries is calling with a less potent appeal. The field of scientific activity is constantly broadening, and in the many new worlds which it offers for conquest the fascination of seeking out the unknown is only equaled by the blessings and benefits which follow for humanity when the victory is won. Medical science has gone far, but the road is still long before it. The glow-worm reminds man that he has yet to produce light without heat, and the electric eel hints at the unsolved problem of electric power without waste in the transformation of energy. The fish mocks the efforts of the submarine navigator, and the bird those of the aviator. Thus nature points the way to the experimenter and the explorer. Then in the sphere of psychic phenomena how little is known, how much remains to be discovered! Even if the mastery of the earth's surface be practically complete, the realm of the unknown looms vaster and beckons more alluringly than ever as mankind advances.

Muscular Rheumatism.

Many physicians think that the soreness and aching in the muscles which are usually called muscular rheumatism are really not rheumatism at all, but neuralgia. For this reason they prefer to call the affection by its other name, myalgia, which means nothing more than muscular pain. It probably belongs, nevertheless, to the indefinite group of diseases called rheumatic, for it occurs frequently in persons who have other rheumatic or gouty troubles, or in whose family these affections prevail; and it is excited by the same things—exposure to cold and damp, for example; overfatigue, indiscretions in eating or drinking—that are believed to bring on an attack of rheumatism in the joints.

Any or all the muscles may be the seat of myalgia, but those most commonly affected are the muscles of the neck, of the shoulder and of the loins. In children it often takes the form of stiff neck, while in persons of middle life the muscles of the loins are not infrequently attacked, constituting what is known, and dreaded by those who have had previous attacks, as lumbago.

When the chest muscles are affected—or the sufferer has "a stitch in the side," or pleurodynia—the pain may be as acute as to simulate pneumonia or pleurisy.

The chief symptoms of muscular rheumatism is pain in the muscles affected, not usually very severe when the parts are at rest, but sometimes excruciating on attempted motion. A light touch may be painful, while deep and firm pressure gives relief.

The acute attack usually begins suddenly, and the pain attains its full severity at the beginning, growing gradually less in the course of two or three days or a week.

In the chronic form there is almost always some soreness and aching in the affected muscles—worse in raw, damp weather.

The internal treatment is the same as for rheumatism of the joints—which is another argument in favor of the belief that the two forms are essentially the same and due to the same cause.

The pain may be relieved by dry heat—the old-fashioned treatment of lumbago by ironing the back is good, although a hot-water bag or a hot brick will do just as well, without the disturbance that the movement of the iron causes.

Perfect rest is essential, and this may sometimes be secured by bandaging the affected part snugly.—Youths Companion.

A Controversy Averted.

LOVE REGNANT.

Where'er I read in mournful history
How all things crumble at the touch of time,
And even great deeds, renowned in mighty rhyme,
Show but as cities buried 'neath the sea,
Which, in calm days, men gaze on awfully,
My heart grows heavy; but one thought sublime
Rises, and therewith the uplifting chime
Of morning stars comes back rememberingly:
Woman, thou art that thought, in whom I know
That I alone gave Time his tyrant might,
Dropping my foolish lids of clay too low,
For, looking up, I see great Love, far, far
Above all changes, like a steadfast star
Behind the pulsings of the northern light.
—James Russell Lowell.

An Incomplete Introduction

The express to the north was on the point of starting. A girl was leaning expectantly out of the window of a carriage containing only one other occupant—a man, in the far corner, who was looking with undisguised admiration at the girl's charming, animated profile. Another girl came running along the platform.

"Here are your papers, Ethel; I thought I should not be in time."

"Thanks, Marion, and good-bye!"

As they shook hands, the man in the corner came forward.

"Why, Stanley!" cried the girl on the platform. "Going to Trevor grange?"

The guard's whistle sounded. There was a banging of doors.

"Why, of course, Ethel—Oh, I forgot, you have never met." The train began to move. "I must introduce you," she cried, running to keep pace with the moving carriage. "Ethel, this is my cousin, Stanley Mortimer——" But the train having gathered speed, she was left far behind on the platform.

In the carriage, the two laughed.

She had heard much of Stanley Mortimer. That he was a very handsome fellow, she could now judge for herself; but she was wondering whether, as she had been told, he was such a consummate flirt, captivating girls easily, making love and leaving victims on his path wherever he went while he himself remained untouched by the tender passion.

HE WONDERED WHO SHE WAS.

He wondered who she was. How silly of Marion not to have begun the introduction in time to inform him of his companion's name. Anyhow, he would have first innings and make headway with her before any of the other fellows at Trevor grange should even have a chance of looking at her.

She smiled sweetly, making some remarks on the length of the journey.

"Oh," he observed, it cannot be too long for me."

"Indeed?"

"Under present circumstances, yes."

"You mean, of course, the return of fine weather," she said, innocently.

"I mean," he answered, "the privilege of the society of a charming fellow guest."

"Oh, well," she laughed, "you will have the pleasure of many charming guests' society at the journey's end; the house party is to be a large one."

"Still, I should prefer to retain the present delightful situation as long as possible."

"Would you? I suppose you have stayed at the grange before?"

"Oh, yes, some time ago, before Harry Trevor was married. He has just returned from abroad and is to be there with his wife. You know her?"

"Very well indeed," she replied, smiling.

"I have never met her, but I hear glorious accounts of her."

"People exaggerate so," she remarked.

"From which I may infer that you are not a blind admirer of Mrs. Harry?"

"I daresay she is all right. Of course," she continued, "you are acquainted with most of the guests you are to meet?"

"I have seen one of them, at any rate, and by the time that we arrive at our destination I hope the acquaintance will have ripened sufficiently to warrant my claiming friendship with her."

"So soon?"

"Why should it take longer? Nearly three hours' tete-a-tete should be equivalent to many days in ordinary circumstances."

"Perhaps so," she admitted, laughing. "Besides, I have heard so much about you, that I seem to know you quite well; your reputation is a wide one."

"Indeed!" He laughed, well pleased; he was proud of the name of ladykiller. "But, as you remarked just now," he said, "people exaggerate so."

"Still one is bound to be a little prejudiced by what one hears."

"You mean that you believe me to be a flirt?"

"Well—aren't you?"

"Not a bit of it," he assured her. "You see, I believe that a man is bound to meet the one woman in the world whom he must love. Until he does, he naturally, in the hope of finding her, goes from one to the other. If his quest is a long one, he is accused of flirting with all the girls he knows, which is unfair. Such a man's love is far more worth having than that of a man easily won by the first pretty face he encounters."

"Still, is it necessary that this man while trying to find the woman who is to fill his life, should make love to girls whom he knows are not the one ideal?"

"You must admit," he replied, lightly, "that some girls are so ready to be made love to that they mistake ordinary courtesies for something different."

"Do they? Then all the more reason why men should be more circumspect."

"You may be right. My attentions to girls might, in reality, have been flirtations; my excuse is this: that was before I met you."

"Have I converted you, then? Are you really never to flirt again?"

"You understand, do you not, that having met the one woman I longed for, my flirting days are over?"

"And how many times before now have you thought that you had found her?"

"I may have thought so more than once," he admitted, laying his hand softly on her gloved one, "but I do not think so now—I know."

She gently disennaged her hand. He thought he had gained an advantage, and tried to pursue it.

"You will believe," he said, impressively, "that you are the one woman for whom I have waited."

They were approaching the country station to which they were bound.

"At any rate, we may consider that you have secured the friendship which it was your desire to claim at the end of the journey."

She fluttered her handkerchief out of the window. "That is the car from the grange," she explained.

Again he tried to secure her hand. "Friendship? I want more than friendship; I want your love."

"I am afraid I could not promise you that."

"Do you mean that there is no hope for me? Ethel—you will not forbid me——" The door of the carriage flew open.

"Here you are, Ethel; had a good day in town?" said a cheery voice. "Why, here is Mortimer, too! How are you, old boy? Let me introduce——"

"Mr. Mortimer and I traveled together, Harry," interrupted Ethel. "Marion introduced him to me in London, just as our train was starting; it made the journey so pleasant, and we have become such great friends, have we not, Mr. Mortimer?"

Mortimer followed, smiling to himself, she had laid such gracious stress on the fact of their new-formed friendship, her smile had been so brilliant and kind, that he thought her previous reception of his advances could only have been prompted by coquetry. Victory was at hand!

They were approaching a large motor, where sat a nurse with a one-year-old child on her lap.

Ethel took a quick step toward it. "Oh, the darling," she cried! "Let me have him, nurse."

"Harry," she said, "Mr. Mortimer has not seen our son yet; isn't he a love?" and she held up the lace-swathed child for Mortimer's inspection.—Ladies' Field.

Girls in Guatemala.

None of the maidens in Guatemala are allowed to go abroad from their homes without the company of a chaperon, and a lover is only allowed to come and court hissweetheart through the heavily barred windows of her father's home. After they are married they pass along the streets in Indian file, the woman marching ahead, so that the husband can be in a position to prevent any flirtations.

After a man weighs a hundred and ninety pounds, he finds out at breakfast what he is to have for dinner.

SECRET OF AEROPLANE'S FLIGHT.

MOVES SO FAST IT HAS NOT TIME TO FALL.

Suppose you had to cross a lake covered with cakes of ice so thin that if you were to stand upon any one of them you would sink. To cross the lake you would have to run from cake to cake, so that you would not give yourself time enough to sink on any one of them. An aeroplane is very much in the same position. It must move so fast that it never has time to fall through any given section of air. Motion, therefore, is the secret of an aeroplane's flight.—New York Times.

THE YOUNGEST SOVEREIGN.

China, the oldest of nations, is ruled, if the expression may be allowed, by the youngest of sovereigns, a boy of 3. He is a nephew of the late emperor, and until his accession bore the name of Pu-yi, although the royal astrologers have selected as his official title Hsuan-t'ung, which means "General Proclamation." The boy, says a writer in the Overland Monthly, is in delicate health, and the Chinese are inclined to attribute this to his birth on the unlucky thirteenth day of the first moon. In order to escape the evil influence as far as possible, it has been decreed that his birthday shall be celebrated on the 14th of the month.

Further, he is to be brought up more hygienically than his predecessor was. He will have plenty of fresh air, and will not be expected to appear at the midnight audiences which are the fashion at the Chinese court. His first appearance in public—at his enthronement—was not a success, for he cried loudly; and henceforth his father, the prince regent, will attend all official functions alone, and will receive dignitaries of state, and offer up the required prayers for snow or rain.

He will also be responsible for plowing the first furrow at the spring festival at the Temple of Agriculture, for the worship of the Lord of Heaven on the white marble altar of the Temple of Heaven, and for the propitiation of the local deities who watch over the old city of Peking.

But the little emperor, although relieved from these duties, will not be allowed to forget that he is an official baby. He may no longer live with his own family, or see his parents except in the presence of the whole court. Twenty-four nurses will keep watch over him, and he has three wives already, aged 10, 12 and 13 years, each of whom receives an allowance of $400 a month.

The exact meaning of his new name, "Hsuan-t'ung," is difficult to render in translation, but the character Hsuan is considered very fortunate. A certain emperor of the Ming dynasty called himself "Hsuan Te," of "Proclamation of Peace," and the symbol is common on old Ming pottery.

Optimistic officials read into Hsuan-t'ung, or "General Proclamation," a reference to the promised constitution; and it is confidently expected that this child emperor, when he comes of age, will inaugurate a new regime of progress and reform in the government of China.

LIPTON'S PUBLICITY METHODS.

Says There Is Much Virtue in Advertising and Quick Action.

"I dare say I owe a great deal of my success to advertising," says Sir Thomas Lipton in the Strand. "I always tried to get hold of some new method. To attract attention I used to post cartoons in my shop window. In later years, when my business had spread on one occasion I engaged an aeronaut to throw out from his car 10,000 telegraph messages addressed to one of my shops. I offered prizes to the first twenty people who arrived with a message, and, the finders coming from all parts of the city, much popular interest resulted.

"Advertisement sometimes, as I have found, results most unexpectedly and from untoward conditions. About 6 I was awakened by the telephone bell ringing in my bedroom. Springing out of bed, I soon learned that a fire had broken out at my Newry branch. On arrival at the scene of the fire I found nothing could be saved, so I immediately telegraphed to my Dublin and Belfast stores and ordered a fresh stock of provisions to be sent by passenger trains. Meanwhile I found another shop close by, and at the usual hour the following morning I had the new premises in full working order. And there was more business done at the second shop than at the first. The fire, it appeared, had drawn public attention to us, and our smartness in opening another shop so quickly was practically appreciated."

The flower of the family isn't necessarily a blooming idiot.

POLITICS OF THE DAY

The Rising in the West.

Mr. William Allen White, of Kansas, is a keen observer of tendencies political and has a forceful way of telling what he has seen. What he has said in the Republic about the determined warfare that Western Republicans have begun against Congressman Cannon and his methods of ruling the House from the Speaker's chair only confirms news that had been previously printed in The Republic.

Factional war within the Republican party in a number of States became certain when their Republican Senators and Representatives voted against the Payne-Aldrich tariff. All hope of reconciliation was thrown to the winds when President Taft, in his Winona speech, lauded the new tariff and practically read the insurgent Congressmen out of the party.

The President's speech was the signal for aggressive attack upon the insurgent Congressmen by the Republican organization in their several States, and they are striking back at Mr. Speaker, who was the President's ally during the special session.

Mr. White has good reasons for his conclusion that the war upon Cannonism is a war to the death. Mr. Cannon and other leaders of the Republican party have had abundant and convincing proof during the last four years that the Western demand for tariff reform will be satisfied by nothing less than a revision made in the interests of the people. As early as the spring of 1906 Mr. Cannon himself wrote to some manufacturers in Ohio that reform of the tariff could not be long postponed. He regretted it, while admitting that the demand for it was too strong to be resisted.

He has, therefore, sinned against the light in steadfastly opposing tariff legislation up to the last moment, and then lending his powerful aid to make a mockery of the revision that could no longer be postponed. The opposition of the Western reformers to Mr. Cannon is not personal. They only insist that he be no longer invested with the powers of the Speakership.

The mistake which President Taft, Speaker Cannon and other supporters of the Payne-Aldrich tariff make is in underestimating the compelling force that lies in the will of a majority of the American people. That will is irresistible and it will have its way. The antimonopoly tariff reform Republicans will wreck the Republican party if they cannot get what they want by any other means.—St. Louis Republic.

Stop the Extravagance.

Customs receipts for the fiscal year have increased $22,000,000 and internal revenue $5,000,000 over last fiscal year, while the treasury deficit is $26,000,000.

Where is the promised era of reform and retrenchment?

President Taft proposes a big bond issue to reforestize Western lands denuded of their trees by lumber kings eager to seize the robber profits granted them by high tariffs. He favors a ship subsidy scheme that will cost $500,000,000 to restore a merchant marine destroyed by the tariff. He advocates a national issue of bonds to construct a waterway system which he himself says is as great an undertaking as the Panama canal.

In all the public utterances of Mr. Taft since the day of his inauguration there has been not one word of economy, not one hint of retrenchment. On the contrary, he has committed himself to vast increases of annual government expenses and monstrous additions to the national debt, which is more than $800,000,000.

When the President returns to Washington Nov. 10 he will have been in office exactly 250 days, 108 of which he has been absent from the capital.

With a large and growing treasury deficit and with delicate international problems arising out of the iniquitous tariff the need of executive supervision at Washington is apparent.

The people, who elected Mr. Taft to his high office and who pay him liberally for his services, hope that for the remainder of his term he will find it convenient to give somewhat more than 60 per cent of his time to affairs or state.—Chicago Journal.

Tariff Resentment Abroad.

Speaker Cannon's defense of the Aldrich-Taft tariff comes at an inopportune moment.

European nations do not act hastily in economic matters, but signs are not wanting that the Aldrich-Taft tariff has stirred up among them a resentment that can not but result in higher barriers against our exports.

Germany is especially indignant, and since, next to Great Britain, Germany is our best customer in the world's market-place her attitude may reasonably be viewed with concern. The Aldrich-Taft bill's provision that wholesale values of foreign goods imported into this country shall be fixed by American customs officers is the particular item that galls the Teutons.

To-day's news that France will enforce her highest tariff rates against American goods after the expiration of the trade treaty Oct. 31 causes no surprise.

France views with disappointment the higher tariff on her principal lines of export to the United States, and regards the maximum clause which increases the entire Aldrich-Taft tariff 25 per cent ad valorem April 1, 1910, as practically prohibitory of all French exports to this country.

All the countries of the Mediterranean are hard hit by increased taxation of their fruits and wines. Their exporters are using every endeavor to secure retaliatory action by their respective governments. All Europe seems to take the same stand as Canada.

Instead of forcing European nations to change their trade treaties and admit the United States on equal terms with the most favored, the Aldrich-Taft bill seems more likely to be met by indignant reprisals. Since these countries purchase from the United States far more goods than the United States purchases from them, the result of a tariff war would be more serious on this side of the Atlantic than on the other.

Such a contest would mean a wonderful development of Canada, South America and South Africa, with their vast natural resources, and an era of unprecedented prosperity for German and British manufacturers.

The Voice of the People.

Senator Aldrich, Congressman Boutell and other trust servants at Washington may imagine that their underhand and tricky methods have accomplished the aims of their masters without awakening the suspicion of the people. If so, they are much mistaken.

The people of the United States know that they are constantly and systematically robbed by the connivance of their representatives at Washington. They realize that the Senate is the head and front of this wrongdoing. They have experienced the top-lofty and sneering attitude of Mr. Aldrich and his fellow Senators regarding the working and producing classes. And just as British liberalism is preparing to discipline the House of Lords the American people are preparing to secure some show of popular government in the Senate at Washington.

Hereditary legislative power is against public policy, no matter whether inherited from a titled father or an unentitled trust. In either case it comes of special privilege. Citizens under any form of popular government are fully aware of that fact.

Thirty-one out of forty-six States have decided that United States Senators should be elected by direct vote of the people. Thirty-one Legislatures have joined in the demand that Congress submit to the people a constitutional amendment to legalize direct election.

The day is fast coming when the Senate will no longer be a sovereign body, dictating to the House of Representatives, but a branch of legislative government, responsible to the voters, as the framers of the constitution intended.

The temper of the people is unmistakable. Direct election of United States Senators cannot be long delayed, and direct election of Senators will do more than any other one thing to hasten the downfall of Aldrichism.—Chicago Journal.

The Redemption of David Corson

CHAPTER XI.—(Continued.)

It occurred to him that if he left the body where it was and it should be eventually discovered, it would afford the gravest suspicions of foul play; but that if he dragged it back again to the road and laid it with its face in the dust, against the rock with which the deed was done, it might pass for an accident.

Once more that hideous smile of cunning lit up the face which in these few moments had undergone a mysterious deterioration. He hastily removed the heap of rubbish, shuddered as he saw the loathsome thing once more exposed to view, but seized it, dragged it back, and placed it with consummate art in the position which his criminal prescience had suggested.

As it lay there in the road nothing could have seemed more natural than that it had fallen from the horse; he felt another momentary relief from terror, in which he cunningly conceived a still more sagacious plan, on noticing Romeo. They were the best of friends; it was easy to catch him. He did so, removed the saddle, broke the girth and placed it near the prostrate figure of the quack. Nothing could have more perfectly resembled an accident. An adept in crime could not have performed this task with finer skill, and he was free now to turn to the rest of the work that he must do to conceal this ghastly deed.

Approaching the buggy, he found to his immense relief that Pepeeta was still unconscious. With swift and silent movements he freed the mare, led her out into the road and drove hurriedly away.

As he emerged from the wood they came to another brook, so similar to the one by the side of which the struggle had occurred, that he conceived the idea of stopping by its side and awakening Pepeeta from her stupor there. "She will not notice the difference," he said to himself; "and if she did not witness the fatal blow I can persuade her that I overpowered the doctor and forced him to return while she was in her swoon."

Stopping the horse, he lifted her inanimate form from the carriage, bore it to the side of the brook, laid it gently upon the bank and dashed a handful of the cold water into her white face. She gasped, opened her eyes, and, sitting up, looked about her with an expression of terror.

"Where am I?" she asked.

"Do you not remember? You are here in the wood where the doctor overtook us," he replied.

"And where is he?"

"He has returned."

"But I saw you clench with each other, and it was awful! What happened then? I must have fainted. Do you mean that he has gone back without me? How did you persuade him to do that?"

"I persuaded him with my fists. You should have seen me, Pepeeta!"

"Did he acknowledge that he had deceived me?"

"He did indeed. Yes, he has gone, never to return. He made his confession and relinquished his claim. And so we have nothing to do but forget him and be happy. Are you feeling better now?"

"Yes, I am better; but I am not well; I cannot shake it off. It seems too dreadful to have been real. And yet how much better it is than if one of you had been killed! Oh! I wish I could stop seeing it. Yet us go! Let us leave this gloomy wood. Let us get out into the sunshine. See! It is getting dark. We must not stay here any longer."

"Yes, let us go," he said, rising, lifting her gently from the ground and leading her back to the buggy, in which they took their seats and drove rapidly forward.

Pepeeta's thought were full of gladness; and David's full of agony—they rushed tumultuously back and forth through his mind like contrary winds through a forest.

"Was it not enough that I should be an Adam, and fall? Must I also become a Cain and go forth with the brand of a murderer on my forehead?" he kept saying to himself.

CHAPTER XII.

The morning after the fight David and Pepeeta hurried on to Louisville, and from there took a steamer to New Orleans. Pepeeta was radiant with joy as they embarked. "How happy I am!" she cried. "It seems as if I had left my old life and the old world behind me!"

"And I am happy to see you glad," answered the wretched youth, whose heart lay in his bosom like lead and whose conscience was writhing with a torture of whose like he had never even dreamed. They embarked unknown and unobserved; but as soon as the first confusion had passed, their singular beauty and unusual appearance made them the cynosure of every eye.

"Who is that splendid fellow?" women asked each other, as David passed with Pepeeta on his arm, while under their breaths men declared that his companion was the loveliest woman who had ever set foot on a Mississippi steamer.

David was in need of excitement. The thought of his crime was constantly agitating his heart, the prostrate form of the doctor with the bloody wound on his forehead was never absent from his mind, and through all the ceaseless rumble around him he could hear the dull thud of the stone upon the hard skull. The efforts which he made to throw off these horrible weights that crushed him were like those of a man awakening from a nightmare. He scarcely dared to speak for fear of uttering words which would betray him and which seemed to tremble on his lips. Had he been on shore he would have fled to the solitude of a forest; but here he was resistlessly impelled to that other solitude—a crowd. The necessity of being gay with his beautiful bride and of concealing every trace of his terror and remorse taxed his resources to their utmost limit, and in his nervousness he kept Pepeeta moving with him all day long. At its close she was completely exhausted; and retired early to her stateroom. Freed from her company and craving relief from thought, David made his way straight to the gambling tables where the nightly games were in full swing.

In the months which they had spent together the quack had indoctrinated David into all the best-known secrets of this vice, and besides this, had familiarized him with the use of a certain "hold out" of his own invention, with which he had achieved incredible results and which was new to the fraternity of the river. Having watched the players for a long time, David convinced himself that he could employ this trick successfully, and took his place at the table.

David felt his way along with a coolness that astonished himself, and his very first experiment with the delicate apparatus concealed in his sleeve was such a brilliant triumph that he saw it was undetected. With a strengthened confidence, he made the stakes larger and larger, and his winnings increased so rapidly as to make him the center of attention. The crowd swarmed round the table. The spectators became breathless. The gamblers were first astonished, then bewildered. As their nerve failed them, David's assurance increased, and when day broke ten thousand dollars lay upon the table before him as the result of his skillful and desperate efforts.

Their loss astonished and enraged the gamblers to such a degree that with a preconcerted signal they sprang at their opponent, determined to regain their money by violence. The move was not unexpected, nor was he unprepared. He fought as he had played, and so won the sympathies of the bystanders than in an instant there was a general melee in which he was helped to escape with the winnings.

He was the hero of the trip, and a career had opened before him. Satellites began to circle around him and to solicit his friendship and patronage. When he disembarked at New Orleans he had already entered into a partnership with one of the most notable members of the gambling fraternity and purchased an interest in one of those "palaces" where games of chance attracted and destroyed their thousands.

The newspapers made the gay throngs of that gayest of all cities familiar with the incidents of David's advent. He and Pepeeta became the talk of the town. They rented a fashionable house, and swung out into the current of the mad life of the metropolis of the South.

For a little while this excitement and glory softened the pain in the heart of the man who believed himself to be a murderer and encouraged him to hope that it might eventually pass away. He played recklessly but successfully, for he was a transient favorite of the fickle goddess. When gambling lost its power to drown the voice of conscience, there was the race, the play and the wine cup! To each of them appealing in turn, he went whirling madly around the outer circles of the great maelstrom in which so many brilliant youths were swallowed in those ante-bellum days.

* * * * * *

For two years David and Pepeeta lived together in New Orleans. They were years full of import, and of trouble. A baby came to them, lingered a few weeks, and then died. David pursued the occupation he had chosen, with the vicissitudes of fortune usually attending the votaries of games of chance, and the moral and spiritual deterioration which they invariably develop.

Pepeeta altered strangely. Her bloom disappeared and an expression of sadness became habitual on her face. She was surrounded by luxuries of every kind, but they did not give her peace. With an ambition which never flagged she sought self-improvement, and attained it to a remarkable degree. Endowed with an inherited aptitude for culture, she read and studied books, observed and imitated elegant manners, and rapidly absorbed the best elements of such higher life as she had access to, until her natural beauty and charm were wonderfully enhanced. Yet she was not happy, for her life with David had brought her nothing but surprise and disappointment; something had come between them, she knew not what.

"Dey des growed apaht," said the old negro "mammy," who was with them during those two years. "Seemed to des tech each other like mahbles at a single point, stade of meltin' togedder lak two drops of watah runnin' down a window pane. Mars' David, he done went he own way, drinkin' and gamblin'; he lak a madman when he baby die. He seem skeered when he see Miss Pepeeta. She look at him wiс her big black eyes full of wonder and s'prise, stretch out her li'l han's, and when he run away or struck her, she des go out to the li'l baby's grave, creeping along lak a shadder through the lyahden, soft lak and still. Dar she des set down all alone and sigh lak de breeze in he old pine tree. Some days she gone away all alone and de brack folks say she wanner all aroun' in de woods. When Sunday come, she des slip into de churches lak a li'l mouse and nibble up de gospel crumbs and den run away before de priests cotch her. Dark days dose, in de old Ballantrae mansion! And den come de night when dey pahted. You done heah about dat?"

The old colored mammy was right. "They just grew apart," as it was inevitable that they should. Perfect self-manifestation is the true principle and law of love, and when a guilty secret comes between two lovers, suspicion and fear inevitably result. They become incomprehensible to each other.

It was a frightful discipline; but she was sanctified by it. Day by day she became more patient, gentle and resigned, and in proportion as she grew in these graces, her lover's awe and fear increased, and so they drifted farther and farther apart. Such relationships cannot continue forever, and they generally terminate in tragedy.

After the first few months' excitement of his new life, David's conscience began to torment him anew. He became melancholy, then moody, and finally fell into the habit of sitting for hours among the crowds which swarmed the gambling rooms, brooding over his secret. From stage to stage in the evolution of his remorse he passed until he at last reached that of superstition, which attacks the soul of the gambler as rust does iron. And so the wretched victim of many vices sat one evening at the close of the second year with his hat drawn down over his eyes, reflecting upon his past.

"What's the matter, Davy?" asked a player who had lost his stake, and was whistling good-humoredly as he left the room.

"Leave me alone," David growled, and reached for a glass mug containing a strong decoction to which he was resorting more and more as his troubles grew intolerable. A strange thing happened! As he put it to his lips its bottom dropped upon the table and the contents streamed into his lap and down to the floor. It was the straw that broke the camel's back, for it had aroused a superstitious terror.

With a smothered cry he sprang to his feet and gazed around upon his companions. They, too, had observed the untoward accident, and to them as well as to him it was a symbol of disaster. Not one of them doubted that the bottom would fall out of his fortunes as out of his glass, for by such signs as these the gambler reads his destiny.

He pulled himself together and made a jest of the accident, but it was impossible for him to dissipate the impression it had made on the minds of his companions or to banish the gloom from his own soul. And so after a few brave but futile efforts to break the spell of apprehension he slipped quietly away, opened the door and passed out into the night.

"GHOSTS" IN NEW YORK CHURCH.

Sexton of Chapel of the Comforter Snapshots Two to Prove It.

There are "ghosts" in the historical old Chapel of the Comforter at 10 Horatio street, near Jackson square! Soren Lindgren, who until recently was sexton of the little mission house supported by Ascension parish, of which the Rev. Dr. Percy Grant is rector, has not only seen the spirits, but he has taken photographs of two of them, the New York Herald asserts.

These strange, mysterious figures, according to Mr. Lindgren, congregate every evening at the foot of the altar. It is a weird story Mr. Lindgren tells of his experience in the church, where he and his wife, who frankly confesses that none of the "ghosts" has been visible to her, had their living apartments.

So interested did the sexton become in the movements of the departed spirits that he purchased a camera and lay awake at nights to take snapshot pictures of them. The Lindgrens took up their residence on an upper floor of the church last November, and the presence of the "ghosts" was revealed to Mr. Lindgren the first night he slept there.

"About 11 o'clock at night," Mr. Lindgren said Tuesday, "I heard a rap on the door of my bedroom. Positive that I had locked the front doors, I was puzzled to know how any one could have entered. I threw open the door and standing in the dark hallway I saw the figure of an old man, with a long flowing gray beard. I asked what he wanted and instantly the figure vanished.

"It was several weeks before the old man again made his appearance. Determined to investigate the matter, I followed the old man into the church. Hardly a second had elapsed until I found the strange figure at my side.

"'Be not afraid,' he assured me. 'This building was once a dance hall, and it was here that I wasted a fortune which had been left to me by my father, who was an Italian nobleman. I killed a man in this very room. Yes, I stabbed him in the back. I stole his money to buy rum, and here I am, a physical wreck.'

"Early the next night," he said, "as the old man approached the altar I fixed my camera in position and gave the picture a long exposure. Mrs. Lindgren was with me and we went directly to our apartment and developed the picture. Only the white outlines of the man's face, head and beard were shown in the photograph, but by using a pencil on one of the negatives I succeeded in drawing an excellent likeness of the mysterious figure."

PREY OF THE TIGER.

Has Preference for Human Flesh After Once Tasting It.

In the intervals of rest and recreation which Mr. Rees doubtless allows himself he may do worse than give his most attentive consideration to certain facts mentioned by a writer in the Indian Forester bearing upon the evolution of the forest tiger's taste, first for cattle and then for human meat, the India Daily News says.

When tired of the monotony of the menu provided by deer or wild pig the forest tiger develops a taste for domestic cattle, and then its modus operandi is a very interesting study. The menue is changed from deep forest to cattle-breeding area, where the tiger leisurely carries on its depredations until shot—an operation which, however it might shock Mr. Rees, is one of the most beneficent acts of the sportsman.

As the writer in the aforesaid periodical says, the transition from cattle slaying to man slaying is not a great step. Where cattle abound human beings are, and once the tiger has tasted the human meat it develops an extraordinary passion for it. And so it must have its daily feed. It goes anywhere in search of food.

Many years ago a tiger swam the Rangoon river, nearly a mile in width, and landed in the heart of the locality, crept under the raised floor of a Burman hut and was promptly slaughtered.

About six years ago a large tiger was observed on the platform of the Shwe-Dogan pagoda at Rangoon and was shot by a party of soldiers told off for the purpose. The superstitious Burmese attributed the outbreak of plague in Rangoon to the shooting of this tiger, which they declared was some particular manifestation of the Buddha. It is a curious fact, however, that the plague outbreak occurred shortly afterward, and the city has not since been free of the scourge.

Experiments are being made with aerial torpedoes in Germany. The torpedoes are driven by electric motors, and it is hoped to control them by wire.

THE HOME AND ITS MISTRESS

A Mother's Lament.

If I had known in the morning
How wearily all the day
The words unkind
Would trouble my mind
I said when you went away,
I had been more careful, darling,
Nor given you needless pain;
But we vex our own
With look and tone
We might never take back again.

For though in the quiet evening
You may give me the kiss of peace
Yet it might be
That never for me
The pain of the heart should cease.
How many go forth in the morning
That never come home at night,
And hearts have broken
For harsh words spoken
That sorrow can ne'er set right.

We have careful thoughts for the stranger,
And smiles for the sometime guest,
But oft for our own
The bitter tone,
Though we love our own the best.
Ah! lips with the curve impatient,
Ah! brow with that look of scorn,
'Twere a cruel fate
Were the night too late
To undo the work of morn.

—Margaret E. Sangster.

Fads and Fancies in Dress

Hats faced with fur.

Dull jet for mourning.

Moire revers on coats.

Poke bonnets of beaver.

Moire belts with jet buckles.

Hat pins with flat oval heads.

Handkerchiefs with tulle edges.

Moire coats with broadcloth skirts.

Irish crochet is seen on all the cloth and silk gowns and insets of Irish crochet, large as well as small, ornament waists of cotton crepe.

A single rose on hats of fur and velvet.

The coat without the center back seam.

A new small hat called a matinee toque.

Ecru and pale gray gloves for street wear.

Broad folded belts of satin on house gowns.

Crosswise puffs in the making of net sleeves.

For the baby, very long capes with hoods attached.

The crepe veil draped at one side for mourning wear.

Chamois facings on the revers of white knitted sweaters.

The jersey which buttons on one side for schoolgirls.

A sombrero shape in beige felt for young women and girls.

Shawl-shaped shoulder wraps of black velvet edged with fur.

Hand embroidery on everything from lingerie and slippers to cats.

Diagonal serge belongs to the Russian blouse suit; it is made in one and two toned effects.

A Paris fad for the wearing of artificial flowers for corsage bouquets, to harmonize with hats.

Satin-finished zibeline is designed for the beautiful afternoon costume with shorter coat, cuffs and lapels.

Bright red is still in favor for children's coats and fall and winter coats in scarlet are shown trimmed with black braid. Tams may be had to match.

The girl of the season is learning the coquetry of the scarf and employs it almost as cleverly as the fan or the pretty parasol with which she flirted this summer.

Trim, high stocks are taking the place of the Dutch and Eton collars in popular favor for the autumn. The latter will still be worn in the house, because of their comfort, but for modish street wear they will be less seen.

Be Content with Little.

After all, can there be a more satisfying success than to achieve contentment with little things—to be happy with simple pleasures and a few dear people in peaceful obscurity?

It takes no heart-hardening struggle to win this goal. It is within the reach of all of us. And as we gather flowers, and look at the sea and the blue sky, we somehow know it to be the truest success of all.

Well as we know it we are so apt to forget that there is a bigger success than making much money and a great name—and that is the daily shaping of a noble character. And that can be done by chiseling with the little tasks of every day in silence and obscurity, as well as with big events in the public glare. But it can never be done by ruthlessly forging ahead over our prostrate ideals.

Pouring Liquids.

It is often most difficult to pour a liquid from a bottle without spilling it. This is especially true of ink, when the neck of the bottle has not a depression. If one will take a toothpick, moisten it and make a line on the neck of the bottle, there will be no further trouble in the pouring. The liquid will always follow the outline on the glass.

What Women Should Know.

When schools teach mothers that giving the baby a "pacifier" means giving adenoids, crooked teeth, misshapen face and chest, perhaps tuberculosis, to the school child; that giving the baby food which does not thoroughly nourish it means giving a poor physique, a weak stomach, anaemia or rickets to the school child; that cleanliness spells health, that neglect of the baby means a backward school child and later on a young man or woman physically unable to cope with wage earning, then mothers will see the wisdom of learning how to take care of the baby, and will keep up habits of health for the school child.

To teach these things a doctor and a nurse who have had practical experience with children should hold regular mothers' classes in the school buildings at least once a week, says the Delineator. Every teacher should attend these classes. Since infant health has so much to do with the health of the child when it comes to school age, it is a matter of vital importance that the school teacher should also understand the care of the child for whom she is later to become responsible.

Beaver Hat Is Popular.

The vogue of beaver as a hat material continues in undisturbed popularity. This chic if substantial looking model of beaver plush in the beautiful soft pervenche or bluish violet shade is a particularly happy conception of the styles of the moment, embracing, as it does, several features which are considered decidedly novel and indispensable in up-to-the-moment hat style. The two curved quills apparently fastened to the hat by a pair of dark violet mercury wings, and the roll of the brim close against the crown on either side, show the sure and inimitable touch of the Parisian modiste's artistic fingers.

MILLINERY

Simple Hat.

Many hats like this one, with their rever caught up smartly at one side by a rosette or bow, are displayed for this season's wear. These hats have a dash, but with all a simplicity, very appropriate for, and very fetching over a youthful face. They are fashioned of the soft felts, the one in question being of deep red; the crown is low, the brim broad and the rever is turned back to the crown and there held by the huge rosette of crushed velvet in self-tone. Through this are thrust two smart quills.

Hang Your Skirts Up.

A woman makes a mistake when she thinks it is not necessary to put old suits on good hangers, says an observing writer. One of the reasons that some women's clothes look so well is because they are kept on hangers until they are given away or discarded. As long as one wears a coat and skirt one should keep it in shape, and this is the only way to do so. Hanging it up by loops destroys its shape. The advantage of keeping it in perfect shape is that it always looks smart, even if the cloth is wearing through.

Curing a Cold.

Don't worry with remedies.

Seek the open air and the sunshine.

Be properly clothed, fed and exercised.

Have your bedroom the abode of fresh air.

Avoid poor air and shun ill-ventilated places.

Cold sprays will keep the skin in good working order.

In addition to this, the bowels and kidneys must do their duty. Sensible, regular eating and drink regulate that.

Everybody has a successful cough and cold remedy, as most colds are mild affairs that run their course in four days or more, or until "the body has time to produce an antitoxin or antibody to stop their further progress."

Hats on the Head.

Hats are worn very low on the head. The roll that has been removed from the pompadour allows the hat to fit firmer over the crown, and as shapes will, on the whole, be less broad, the pose of the hat will be less spectacular. We shall see no more brims touching or resting full on the shoulders.

To Remove Mildew.

Rub tomato on the stains, sprinkle salt over thickly, and lay in the sun. Repeat this two or three times if necessary.

Taking Soot from Carpet.

Never sweep fresh soot from a carpet as the result is sure to be a disfiguring stain. Cover it quickly with kitchen salt and then sweep it up.

A TRIO OF STRIKING COSTUMES.

THE TUNIC GOWN.

The close fitting tunic continues in undisturbed popularity for gowns of broadcloth and fancy permos, the use of draped panniers being possible only when the material is of a soft, pliable nature, such as the chiffons or silk cashmeres. This practical little model is one of the one-piece gowns which have come into use with the advent of the becoming topcoat. The gown is of a dark-green permo-finished material of English make, soft of texture, though firm and durable, combining, as it does, both mohair and wool.

MILITARY TRIMMING.

Evening wraps for this winter show much fullness at the sides, many of the very newest French models having such full draped side sections that they resemble the pannier effects seen hitherto on gowns only. This model is not only distinctly chic and new in every detail, but also has the unique advantage of being comfortably protecting from wintry blasts with its high collar and small arm openings. It is developed in gold embroidered broadcloth, embroidered about the collar in gold soutache.

A REMODELED GOWN.

Here are some suggestions for a simple way to remodel a last year's close-fitting princess gown, giving it several decidedly this season's touches. The addition of a sailor collar with guimpe and sigh-standing collar of dotted net to a low-cut Dutch-neck gown of last season, would change the top of the garment and immediately proclaim it as decidedly this season's. A girdle of soft satin, defining the natural waist line, could be draped across the front, vanishing under the side panel.

Civil War Stories

Personal Experience.

I was a private in Colonel E. Mosby's command, and early earned the title of a "hard case." How I got that undesirable, and in my case undeserved character, I will tell you.

In May, 1864, we were lying at Upperville, Va., and I started for Charlestown to see my girl. I found that town full of Yankees. Being well mounted, I resolved not to be captured. Such a race as ensued. I started for Smithfield with a whole brigade of Yankees in chase. In a couple of miles Lieutenant Stone joined me, and in a couple of miles more two other graycoats, the younger of these being married but one hour before he had to fly. They pressed us so hard that we had to take to the woods. Soon after we encountered a deep ravine at full speed. I shut my eyes, felt my horse spring and sail through the air, and land on the other side. At least fifty horses and riders piled up in that ravine, my companions with the rest. I rode easy, resting my horse until I arrived at Goosetown, when I heard the Yanks yell within two hundred yards. What a horserace we had with them for a couple of miles. The greater part of the Yanks stopped in Goosetown, but two following. In a few moments I saw General Early's train moving from Winchester to Gordon's Springs.

Now I concluded to capture my Yankee pursuers, so ran my horse behind a blacksmith shop and waited. In a moment they dashed by and I after them. I cannot explain nor understand how, but in some way I got mixed after the Yanks got to the train, and ordered the wrong trooper to surrender, and he in turn called a guard and captured me. He had on the blue, hence my mistake. Well, I told them my story, confident of immediate release, when to my surprise I was informed that none of my cursed Yankee tricks would go down. Talk availed me not—I was held a prisoner.

After a little General Early sent, at my request, for General Rhodes, and I was released. Meanwhile, I had learned that in losing my Yankee I had taken after Major General Harmon.

General Rhodes and I started out together. On the way I told him about my race. He told me I was certainly mistaken about the Yanks being at Goosetown, as his pickets were on that road and, to convince me, he, his brother and I rode back. Goosetown is in a basin-like valley, and we let the General ride ahead as we approached the top of the hill. No sooner was he at the hill top than a shower of lead greeted him. There was a regiment camped there.

The General decided at once to attack them from front and rear. He went for his men, but all but four hundred of the Yankees got away before the surround could be made.

I, being one of Mosby's men, owned whatever plunder was captured by me, which was forty-six horses, saddles, and equipments. I had to get two of the prisoners to help me with my captures.

When I arrived at Mosby's camp I found my regiment all ready for a move after a wagon train. I was informed that I must take my prisoners to Winchester and turn them over. This I could not do and go with my regiment. It soon came dark. I told my prisoners that the best thing for them to do was to take a couple of halters, go over where General Imboden's horses were in pasture, get two good ones, and git. We shook hands, and they did so.

When I rejoined my regiment the boys asked, "What did you do with your prisoners?" "Oh, I left them out in the woods," was my response. They believed that I had killed them, and so believe yet.

Could they have witnessed the reception which those same boys gave me June 5, 1865, in New York City, they would have thought differently. And that, Mr. Editor, is how I came by my hard name.

Masonry in the Civil War.

E. E. Williams of Kirkwood, Mo., a suburb of St. Louis, related to friends in the Masonic order in Washington, a remarkable story of the Civil War which demonstrates how seriously Masonry was regarded in those days.

"I have just been on a visit to my father, L. J. Williams, whose home is in Harvard, N. Y.," he said. "My father served in the Civil War as a member of the One Hundred and Fourteenth New York volunteers. He is a member of the Downsville blue lodge, No. 464.

"When the war broke out the Entered Apprentice and Fellowcraft degrees had been conferred on him in New York. He went out in the defense of his country, without having been raised to the degree of a Master Mason. It was his misfortune to be taken a prisoner of war while at or near Savannah. While he lay in the Southern prison he communicated with some of his friends in the North.

"His lodge in New York, through the proper officials, got in touch with Zerubbabel Lodge in Savannah, and made the request that the Savannah lodge, as a favor to the brethren of the North, confer the third degree on Fellowcraft brother, L. J. Williams.

"One night my father was taken from his prison and conducted to the Savannah lodgeroom. It was a remarkable occasion. He wore his bedraggled blue uniform, token of his sympathy with the cause of the North. He was surrounded by men who wore the gray. All the chairs were occupied by Confederate officers. They were on opposite sides in a struggle to the death, but they were brethren. Then and there he was raised to the sublime degree of a Master Mason and acclaimed a friend and brother by his enemies.

"But the more significant feature of the story was yet to follow. For on the same night my father escaped from his prison and rejoined his comrades of the North. I have visited Savannah since then and I looked up the records of his raising. In red ink, on the same page that records the fact that the degree was there conferred, is the brief annotation: 'On this night Brother Williams escaped from prison.'

"I have talked with my father about the matter a number of times. When asked about his 'escape' he always smiles peculiarly. 'You may put it down as an escape,' he told me, 'but it wasn't an escape, strictly speaking. For on that night some men came to my prison. They put me in a boat and carried me off some distance. Then they deposited me on neutral soil between the lines. From there I found my way back to my friends. Who my rescuers were I have never learned. It is their own secret and it has never been disclosed. But in my own mind I know exactly to whom I may attribute the 'escape' in question. His name is Hiram.'"

The narrator of the story is a member of Kirkwood blue lodge, 484. He has also taken the Royal Arch and the Scottish Rite degrees.

Love in the Hospital.

Here is a true story of love. It has none of the vapid romance of the seaside, nor the sprightliness of the ballroom, but it shows and evidences that the human heart is susceptible to love under the most adverse conditions. Indeed, we are not sure but love—true love—is a plant of more tender and healthful growth when removed from all selfish and narrowing surroundings.

At the beginning of the war most of the Southern troops were sent to Virginia. Among other regiments the Fifth Alabama, under Colonel R. E. Rodes, who was afterward promoted to major general, moved from Montgomery to Richmond, and afterward to Manassas Junction, near Bull Run. After remaining there a short time a member of Company D, Fifth Alabama, was taken sick with camp fever and sent to the hospital at Culpeper Court House. The hospital was in charge of a lady from Hale County, Alabama, by the name of Miss Sally Anne Swope, a noble-hearted woman, but a perfect fire-eater toward the Yankee soldiers. She would nurse a sick or wounded soldier either Yankee or rebel, as wel as if he was one of her own family, and at the same time if he were a Yankee she would tell him that she could cut off his head when he was well. After the young man came to the hospital, he continued to grow worse, and at times would be entirely delirious. I was sick at the same time, and noticed a bright, pretty young woman, whose name I will not mention for fear it will recall sad memories to her dear friends and relatives, and whom they will remember with pride for the many noble traits of character she possessed. She would sit by the gallant soldier, during his moments of delirium, for hours, and bathe his brow with her soft, pretty hands and soothe his restless spirit with cheering words. At times the soldier would catch her hand and talk of the dear ones at home, thinking it was his loved sister. Again he would tell her how he loved her—whispering words of love. It became well known by all the friends at the hospital that it was a case of true love. Although it was a labor of love and mercy that made the lady a nurse, yet she never neglected her many patients. At the same time her lover, who was much sicker than any other, received all of her spare time. But the poor fellow continued to grow worse from day to day. The poor girl watched with intense sorrow and affection his sunken features, sweetening the long hours of watching with such loving looks and expressions as could not be mistaken. At last the end came. The dear creature who had watched his bed seemed to have wasted to a mere shadow. The doctors advised rest; but no, she continued to hover around the other patients like one in a dream, providing for their every want. Alas! her heart was broken, and in a short time she too was laid in the grace, having contracted the fever from her lover.

The First News from Gettysburg.

In these days, when the news service of the world is so perfectly organized that the Battle of Manila in all its essential details was described in the newspapers of America only a few hours after the echoes of the last gun had died away, it is hard to realize how slow and fragmentary was the diffusion of news in Civil War times. The three days' Battle of Gettysburg was over and Lee had begun his retreat before any inkling of the actual fighting reached Washington.

Under date of Saturday, July 4, Gideon Welles, Secretary of the Navy in Lincoln's Cabinet, wrote in his diary, which is now being published in the Atlantic Monthly:

"I was called up at midnight precisely by a messenger with telegram from Byington at Hanover Station, stating that the most terrific battle of the war was being fought at or near Gettysburg; that he left he field at half-past 6, and that everything looked hopeful. The President was at the War Department where this dispatch, which is addressed to me, was received. It was the first word of the great conflict. Nothing had come to the War Department. There seems to have been no system, no arrangement for prompt, constant and speedy intelligence. I had remained at the War Department for news till about 11. Some half an hour later the dispatch from Byington came to me over the wires, but nothing for Stanton or Halleck. The operator in the War Department gave the dispatch to the President, who remained. He asked, 'Who is Byington?' No one in the department knew anything about him, and the President telegraphed to Hanover Station, 'Who is Byington?' The operator replied, 'Ask the Secretary of Navy.' I informed the President that the telegram was reliable. Byington is the editor and proprietor of a weekly paper in Norwalk, Connecticut, active and stirring, is sometimes employed by the New York Tribune, and is doubtless so employed now."

Save Money in Cereals

The best and biggest bargain a housekeeper can buy is a Mother's Kit

Go to your grocer and ask him to show it to you. A complete assortment of different delicious cereals for every palate for every meal.

Not only is it economy to buy your staple cereals in sufficient quantities at economical prices, just the same as it is cheaper to buy flour by the barrel and butter by the crock, but in every Mother's Kit there is in addition to the saving in cash a special Fireless Cooker Certificate, equal to 18 coupons, which when added to the coupons from the packages in the kit enables you to secure a wonderful fireless cooker by merely adding 89 cents.

A Mother's Kit consists of eighteen assorted packages of Mother's Cereals, packed in sanitary sealed packages, in which they are guaranteed to keep in perfect condition indefinitely.

8 Packages of Mother's Oats, standard size.
2 Packages of Mother's Yellow Corn Meal.
1 Package of Mother's White Corn Meal.
1 Package of Mother's Wheat Hearts.
1 Package of Mother's Corn Flakes (toasted).
1 Package of Mother's Old Fashioned Steel Cut Oatmeal.
2 Packages of Mother's Granulated Hominy.
2 Packages of Mother's Coarse Pearl Hominy.

This kit can be purchased at your grocer's by simply paying $1.95. The grocer himself will either redeem your coupons and deliver the $3.75 Fireless Cooker, or, if you so desire, send the coupons and 89 cents directly to us and we will ship the Cooker to you, express collect.

If your grocer does not keep Mother's Cereals, write to us, giving his name and yours, and we will send you free a useful souvenir.

Edgerton

S. E. Reed and wife are visiting riends at Lima.

William Alleman and family visited with C. Jinnings and family, Sunday.

Mrs. Nellie Mamis has been visiting her parents, Reed Jewels the last few days.

The sink went down the most Saturday night that it has at any time. It has gone down over 30 feet and there has been over 200 carloads of gravel put in. There were about 50 men worked all day Sunday to get the tracks up to a level again.

Rev. Coates, of Metz, gave an interesting talk on the subject of "Character Building," at the Men's meeting at the Christian church, Sunday afternoon.

The Lake Lhore has put teams and a gang of men to work hauling dirt into the sink at Mina along the side of grade.

Wm. Yackee has been transferred from here to South Bend by the Lake Shore to work in the freight department.

E. A. Farnham sold several lots in last addition to Edgerton last week, owing to the boom in Edgerton on account of the Lake Shore division.

Imm Bros. received a carload of machinery from the International Harvester Company, Friday.

Mrs. S. W. Yarlot died last Friday night. Funeral was held at Ney, Ohio, Sunday afternoon. Interment at that place. Her death was a shock to nearly everyone as she had only been sick a couple days.

The sink at Mina on the railroad is going down faster this week than at any time yet, presumably on account of the big rain last Monday. It went down faster than the men could raise it. It went down until the track swung clear of the gravel. The one track goes down for 1200 feet, another 800 feet and the third track 300 feet.

Fort Wayne athletes play foot ball with our boys in Edgerton this Thanksgiving. They will get it where the turkey got it.

Lame back comes on suddenly and is extremely painful. It is caused by rheumatism of the muscles. Quick relief is afforded by applying Chamberlain's Liniment. Sold by Geo. W. Geddes. 44-1m

Spencerville

Monday was a wet day. Everybody was wet as he could be.

Joe B. Haifley's sale was largely attended on the 20th. Joe will soon be a citizen of St. Joe.

Calvin Stanffer, wife and children are visiting John Means and family before their return to Kansas.

John Means sold Charles Henderson 91 fruit trees the other day. John is going to have a big delivery at this place in the spring.

Lester Monroe and wife, of Montgomery, Mich., are visiting the latter's parents, John Means and wife.

Mrs. Libby Wasson called on friends Tuesday. She took dinner with John Means and family.

Monday Knight Blair, of Fairview, was buried. It was a very bad day for a funeral, as it rained all day.

Bert Rhoads will take possession of the Haifley farm in about two weeks so we understand.

Great excitement is being stirred up with the wets and drys. Better quit making or importing any in the U. S. for anything. So far we have failed to see much benefits as yet.

Moores

Rev. Brook, the new minister, preached at this place, Sunday.

Jos. Pifer and family and August Blum and wife spent Sunday with Harmon Ketel and wife.

Mrs. James Smurr, of Indianapolis, visited relatives ocre last week.

Mrs. Speaker and Mrs. Longeway and son, of Bellmore, O., are visiting Virgil Blawvelt and wife.

Mrs. Forest Dermott, of near St. Joe, spent a few days last week with her parrnts, Henry Smurr and wife.

Mrs. Lester Spurgeon, of Butler, spent Sunday with John Mutzfeld and family.

Rev. S. Hill, of Laketon, preached at Mt. Pleasant, Thursday evening, and called on friends here Friday.

Chas. Ridge and family spent Monday with Fred Bunge and family.

Newville

Mrs. Geo. Benninghofe was called to Hicksville Monday by the illness of Mrs. Conley.

Mrs. Arvilla Miller went to Butler Wednesday to spend Thanksgiving with ffiends.

Manford Smiths' of Hicksville visited here Sunday.

Jim Revett and family of Toledo were the Sunday guests of Elmer Wyatt and wife.

W. Benninghofe and B. Enzor and their families and Mrs. Geo. Benninghofe spent Thanksgiving with George Shutt and wife, at Spencerville.

Harry Rank and wife are the proud parents of a baby girl since Monday.

Quarterly meeting at the U. B. church last Friday afternoon and evening. The members have hired Mr. Brock from the southern part of this state.

Misfcrtune comes to all, but luck sometimes follows. Wes Shafer recovered his lost pocket book which contained ovea $90. He lost it in Fort Wayne several days ago.

Mrs. Lew Gries, of Hicksville, and her niece, Mrs. Warner, of Jackson, spent Saturday and Sunday with relatives here.

The male quartett of Butler accompanied Rev. Shumaker here Friday evening and gave us several fine selections.

If all the voters in Newville township had listened to Rev. Shumaker's lecture last Friday evening and to Rev. F. A. Thomas Sunday evening we feel certain there would be no more wet voters.

Sam Tomlinson and D. J. Blair, with their families spent Sunday at Scio with Mr. and Mrs. F. Akins.

Croup is most prevalent during the dry cold weather of the early winter months. Parents of young children should be prepared for it. All that is needed is a bottle of Chamberlain's Cough Remedy. NAPOLEON OF OUTLAWS.

How His Gang Terrorized Montana in Its Early Days.

The discovery of gold in Montana in the early '60's caused a stampede which for a time threatened to depopulate the country around Denver. A large number of the dangerous class naturally went in to cultivate the broad, rich field for lawless operations. These desperadoes quickly organized a secret compact body, with signs and grips, with captain, lieutenants, a secretary, road agents, and outriders, who became the terror of the whole region. Henry Plummer, the chief of this extraordinary band and unquestionably the Napoleon of western outlaws, had once been marshal of Nevada City, whence after having twice been imprisoned for murder, he fled to Oregon and thence to Montana. He soon ingratiated himself into the favor of the people by his singularly smooth manners and insinuating address, and ere long was elected sheriff of Beaver County.

Plummer was famed for desperation and skill in the use of a gun, and in a quarrel at Bannock he shot and killed his friend, Jack Cleveland, who was disposed to dispute his title as chief of the outlaws. Plummer was tried for murder, but was acquitted on the ground that the dead man's language had been irritating. At the same time Charles Reeves and a man named Williams, members of the Plummer band, who had fired into a camp of unoffending Indians to see how many of them they could kill at one shot, were tried for murder, and acquitted. Soon thereafter another of the outlaws, George Ives, was conversing in the street with his friend, George Carhart, and taking exception to his speech shot him dead. He also went unwhipped of justice. Another member of the band, Haze Lyon, who had attempted to kill his landlord because the latter had asked him to pay his board bill, was tried and acquitted.

These acquittals gave the outlaws a feeling of security and emboldened them to go forward with their murderous work. Plummer, as sheriff of the county, had it within his power to give the outlaws ample protection. He appointed two of his gang deputy sheriffs. An honest man had been elected sheriff at Virginia City through the influence of the late John A. Creighton and other citizens. Plummer sent word that he would live longer if he would resign in Plummer's favor, and, fearing assassination, he did so. With his robber deputies to execute his orders, Plummer had the people of Montana completely at his mercy, and nowhere was there security of life or property. It developed that one of the deputies was an honest man. Fearing that he might turn informer, Plummer had him sentenced to death by the outlaws and publicly shot by three of them.

The sentiment of the honest men of the community was aroused by these outrages, and the fate of Plummer and his band was soon sealed. A Dutchman, driving some mules to market, was held up in a lonely spot by George Ives, robbed and murdered. His body was taken into Nevada City, and the sight of it stirred the indignation of the law-abiding citizens to the highest pitch. A posse scoured the countryside, surprised accomplices of the murderer, and wrung from them a confession that Ives had committed the crime. Ives was captured and taken to Nevada City, where he was given a trial. The bench was a wagon, and the jury twenty-four honest men. While the trial proceeded citizens stood guard with guns in hand and their eyes fixed upon the outlaws, who had gathered in force to rescue their comrade in crime. Counsel was heard on each side, witnesses testified, and Ives was found guilty of murder and sentenced to death. The citizens repressed every attempt at rescue and saw the sentence executed. Plummer was finally caught and strangled on a gallows he himself had erected, two of his deputies being put to death at the same time.

Cheap Charity.

Mother Aphonsa, the daughter of Nathaniel Hawthorne, devotes her life to those afflicted with cancer. It is to her that New York owes its admirable Hawthorne Cancer Home. At a recent meeting in aid of the home Mother Alphonsa spoke of charity—a subject whereon, surely, no one could speak with more authority.

She said that too many people went in for cheap charity, that too many resembled a certain railroad president. A manager came to this president and began:

"Old John Faithful's health has broken down. He had to leave last week. After his long service I think, sir, we ought to do something for him, don't you? He's very poor."

"How long has John been with us?" asked the president.

"Forty-seven years, sir."

"He always did his duty?"

"He never missed a day, sir."

"And now he's broken down completely, eh?"

"The chances are he'll never leave his bed," said the manager.

"The poor fellow," said the president. "We certainly must do something for him."

He turned to his secretary.

"Perkins," he said, "make out John Faithful a free pass for life."

HISTORIC MANSIONS.

Virginia Has Many Colonial Buildings to Preserve.

The State of Virginia, "Mother of Presidents," is rich in colonial mansions and buildings of historic interest. Just a few weeks ago, Montville, the colonial home of Patrick Henry, was on the point of being burned by its owners, descendants of the great Virginian, merely because it had become infested with bats. But the Society for the Preservation of Virginia Antiquities has taken steps which will permit the maintenance of the venerable building and its eventual purchase and conversation into a museum.

Many priceless monuments of American history dot Virginia area, most famous of them all being Mount Vernon, the home of President Washington on the Potomac river. This is the greatest patriotic home shrine in the country, and is the best preserved and managed. Another mansion, "Montpelier," in Orange County, was built by President Madison, who did such valiant service in maintaining the constitution in its early days.

Every Democrat worships the home of Thomas Jefferson, famed "Monticello," in Albemarle County. The home is in close prmximity to the University of Virginia. Monticello was captured and sacked during the wars with Britain, but the property itself was uninjured.

"Mount Airy," on the Rappahannock river, in Richmond County, is not so well known as the famous structures already enumerated, yet it presents a beautiful picture of the colonial life of a century ago. Its broad acres have been in the hands of the Taylor family for 150 years. Only a few homes, such as the Chew mansion, in Germantown, Philadelphia, have remained in any one family for so long a period. Another most famous home is "Tuckahoe," on the James river, near Richmond. Here lived Thomas Mann Randolph, brother of John Randolph, the great orator, both of them direct descendants of Pocahontas.

"Chelsea," in Yorktown, Va., was the residence of Gov. Nelson. It is one of the oldest houses in the state, and it was from this building that the order to fire was given in the siege of Yorktown.

"Kenmore," in Fredericksburg, was built by Col. Fielding Lewis, who married Betty Washington. He strove to build for her the finest residence in the country, and came pretty near to succeeding, the interior decorations being especially notable. At "Kenmore," Mary Washington, mother of George, died.

The grand character of Robert E. Lee, name revered in north and south, is shown in his magnificent home, "Arlington," in Fairfax County. It is across the river from Washington.

One of the most famous of colonial homes is "Westover," which was built by William Byrd, president of the Colonial Council of Virginia, author of the Westover Manuscripts. About twenty-five miles below Richmond, in Charles City County, is "Berkeley," which evokes special interest in being the birthplace of William Henry Harrison, the most popular general of his day, and twelfth President of the United States. In the same county as the Harrison birthplace is "Sherwood Forest," once the home of another President, John Tyler.

"Oak Hill," home of President Monroe, completes the more important of a notable list of mansions, whose careful preservation is at once the privilege and duty of Virginia.

What is Your Aim in Buying Goods?

Is not true that every person that buys any kind of merchandise expects value received for his money.

Cheap shoes as a rule do poor service.

It goes without saying, "He profits most who buys good goods."

We do not claim that our shoes are any cheaper than some other good shoes for low price is the running mate of low quality.

What we claim and can prove is that our shoes have created a money making habit for our customers because of the service they give.

A customer well served will bring a friend with him next time. This is where our shoes count faster to you than compound interest.

BUTLER SCHOOL OF SIXTY-NINE

William H. McIntosh Who Was Then Its Principal Tells of Early Days

Assured that the good people of Butler among whom I am proud to claim many friendships of early origin, will be interested in a brief reference to their school and scholars as I knew them, advantage is taken by the courtesy of A. S. Powers, editor, to give a merited public notice in the colums of the DeKalb County Herald.

From the earliest day the pioneer and the settler of Butler and its vicinity down to the present have shown and confirmed a laudatory interest in education. The first building upon the site of what is now the beautiful and thriving town of Butler was erected in 1841. It was of log structure, large for a building of its kind, and for sunlight had upon each side a long and narrow window made by part of a section of a single log. It stood just north across the street from the M. E. church, a little back from the road which it faced broad side. In this rude structure L. Harding was the first teacher, and of those who learned therein to read, to write and to spell none survive and very few have personal knowledge of its history.

The first dwelling put up by Mr. Brainard was long occupied by Mr. Otis. In 1851, a small trading port had been established upon the southwest corner of land owned by Charles Norris. In a log cabin upon the spot where later stood the store of Stiefel & Strauss Ladd Thomas and Osburnd Auburn began business. The outlook was favorable, and a village sprang up to which was given the name Norristown, and as such it was long known to the settlers of that section of country. The name "Jarvis" was applied to the town which finally and permanently became "Butler." Early in 1855, Norristown contained two or three business houses, one or more saloons, then called "groceries," besides a dozen dwellings, a few built of logs, but the most framed. The dense forest came up within stone's throw of the main corners and the country all about was new and crude, for farm homes were chiefly of logs centrally located in small clearings of stumps and girdled trees.

The right-of-way of the Northern Indiana railroad had been cut out and for a time hope was buoyant for a road, but unfortunately the company failed and for many years the partially graded track remained a memory. So much by way of introduction railroads have been built, factories have been operated, banks and business houses have been established, churches have been erected, population has flowed, ebbed and flowed again until retrieving disaster the city stands on a firm footing and looks forward to such public improvements as are needed, feasible and sure to commend themselves to the enterprise of the people.

Interest in education was constant from the beginning and forty years ago the Butler graded school stood unrivaled in DeKalb county and many other counties of the state of Indiana for fine site and building, highly personality of pupils of whose attendance, deportment and scholarship, parents and the public had good reason to be proud. The school house located upon beautiful and spacious grounds in the northeast part of the town was a three storied brick structure, admirably planned with large study and recitation rooms, comfortable double seats and desks and exceptionally fine blackboards. A monitor clock struck the call and dismission of classes to and from recitation benches and a bell rope suspended at the desk placed the opening and closing of the other departments with the intermissions at the principal's control.

The first to teach in this building was Dexter Ladd Thomas who later went west. His successor was James Grier Bowersox, a christian minister, a man of the Lincoln type and a teacher who realized and loved his high calling. By this able principal the foundation was laid deep and strong for the well merited reputation of the schools of Butler. Impressed by desire for higher grade of scholarship he requested and was given release from his position during the fall of 1869, and passed a year at Otterbein University. On return he taught as principal of Waterloo schools and again at Butler with phenomenal success. Prior to departure from Butler in November, 1869, he heartily recommended his friend, Wm. H. McIntosh, the county school examiner, resident of Auburn, to fill the place vacated.

The Butler school board was composed of Messrs David Fay, Stephen Olmstead and John A. Campbell, all happily interested and qualified for their position. Mr. Campbell was himself a teacher of ability in the grammar department, the most difficult in most schools, and for many years engaged in insurance, was one of Butler's most respected citizens. His death occurred Nov. 4, 1905. This board accepting the suggestion of Prof. Bowersox communicated with the writer inviting him to take charge of their schools for the three months winter term at the then liberal salary of $78 00 per month. The offer was promptly accepted and on December 6, the schools opened with Mrs. Marilla Snively in the primary and Clara Gilmore in the intermediate department on the ground floor, J. A. Campbell grammar room, second floor, and W. H. McIntosh, the high school in the third story. Enrollment and percentage of attendance in the several rooms for the first month were as follows: High school, 54·92; grammar, 72·97; intermediate, 65·83; primary, 68·71; total enrollment, 259. Second month—High school, 57·96; grammar, 78·96; intermediate, 67·85; primary, 70·87; total, 272. And this was during the inclemency of winter. No better criterian of interest can be shown and some idea of the character of teachers and pupils is there revealed. If any instructor of today has better, more faithful youth in his charge he is indeed to be congratulated as fortunate.

In order, study and recitation, there was an ardor that reflected honor to teacher and the taught. Personally it mattered not whether the principal was present or absent the school, self-governed, went on without disturbance. Resident of Auburn, the writer, was accustomed to walk to and from Butler at the beginning and close of each week, and when from storm and heavy roads, his arrival in the schoolroom was delayed until the school was in session he had no misgiving, but always found the proper class at recitation conducted by some one of their number and the rest at their studies. One day at recess a committee came to the desk and one speaking for the department asked that the school be left to itself on each Friday afternoon at intermission that their teacher might intrain for Waterloo and so be spared the fatique of a long walk. This kindly offer was gladly accepted and a stranger visitor on such an occasion was astonished to find a school of manifestly highest morals. The principal, then 32 years of age, had served three years of the war for the union in a regiment of infantry and knew how to appreciate the ready obedience of devoted scholars and a regard was engendered that has not known forgetfulness during all these succeeding years. The members of the high school were not only from Butler and adjacent farms but other sections of the county and young gentlemen and ladies in the full acceptation of the term whose steadfast purpose was a self-improvement under favorable conditions.

While the study course included classes in high grades, there was a daily drill in oft-neglected fundamental principles as of rhetoric in reading and speaking, of writing on spencerion models, and of simple addition in arithmetic. To such advantage was this done that it was the custom, pleasant to the school, for many visitors to be present. It would be interesting to call the roll of the first term, but our limitation admits mention of but a few of the many equally deserving in points of good scholarship. The most advanced class was composed of Sumner Otis, James Boyle, John Young and Mary Blaker. These scholars in true sense of the word in due course completed Higher algebra, Plane geometry and did creditable work in Latin and Greek. Later a portion of this class graduated during the teaching of James Burnes, an excellent instructor. Otis became a teacher of merit in the schools of Garrett and Ohio where he stood high in his profession. Boyle took up law and had made promising beginning when his career was untimely closed by death. Young went to Minnesota and was for a time warden of the state prison, and Miss Blaker, oldest of a family of exceptionally good teachers, pursued her calling in distant Oregon. Gifted in oratory, scholarly in study, Orrin Hubbell, graduating from college, served in the legislature as state senator, made a reputation as lawyer and had acquired wealth when death claimed him at his then residence in California. James McCurdy was a farmer's son who made fine record at the Butler school, became a minister and for many years has pursued his high calling in Kansas. Charles V. Lewis refined, steady and ambitious, completed his education at Delaware college, and realizing his aspiration was for years the trusted cashier of a Kansas City National bank and his latest official position is that of vice-president of the National Planters' bank of St. Louis. William Mitchell turned his attention to medicine in which he won good standing, was one of the board of pension examiners in Noble county and died in 1907 at his home in Kendallville. Most pleasant is the recollection of Charles Knisely whose friendly glance meeting the look of the principal at his desk was reciprocally encouraging and early promise of sterling manhood has been realized in a useful life that has made desirable his residence as a good citizen of this county. A younger brother, Luther, has been an honor to school and township as a state representative. The same may be as well said of William Jackman, of Smithfield township. There was Jerome Brown studious, scholarly and of the best principles, who held high rank in the class and school, and in all the years has been a successful business man in Butler with whose people he is held in esteem and confidence for exceptionally good citizenship. And there was Isabel Sargeant fluent and forceful in rhetorical recitations. Wynn Barnet, now a reputable surgeon, resident of Fort Wayne, George Nimmons, the best in the class of bookkeeping, a successful dealer in Minneapolis real estate. Edith Jackman, an elocutionist of merit, Andrew Carper, an established physician of Elkhart, and Isaac N. Cool, of Jackson township, a close student and a successful carriage maker at Logansport, Ind., and Paxton, Ill. We recall the Carpenters, William and Ida, the Masons, Byron and Warren, others of the Boyles, William and Jefferson, the Shoubs, Norman and Alice, the Burrells, Richard, Jamison and Francis, Edward Fosdick, Jay Norford, Celia Rank and yet so many so deserving of mention in glad recollection where lives have realized bright promise, that a volume would not suffice to give even bare outline of their lives and merits.

Surely the members of the high school department of the Butler graded school of 1869, have made proud record and honored themselves and their instructors. It would be interesting to speak of those instructors of Burnes and Hamlin, of Sanders and Coe and all those succeeding, but that is another chapter of Butler school history.

The old school building having served its day and its generation has been replaced by a larger, finer structure in which the highly valued work of educating the city youth of the present finds staunch support as ever with the citizens. As the log house of 1841, gave place to the brick building of 1869, so the new school edifice marks the growth and progress of the later day and there is suggestive inspiration in this sketch and a latent challenge to the teachers and pupils of the Butler graded schools of today to maintain, but they cannot excel the noble example as set by the scholarship of forty years ago.

JOHN COATS BADLY BURNED

Telegram Calls His Mother to His Bedside.

Mrs. C. J. Coats was called to Lexington, Ky., Wednesday noon, by message, "that John her son, had been seriously burned." Since she went Mr. Coats has received a telegram from Fred N. Coats containing the following particulars of the accident:

"Gasoline tank exploded. John burned badly, also left hand. Eyes all right. No burns below chest. Resting easy in hospital. Have trained nurse. Doctors think burns not deep, and will soon recover without being disfigured. Don't tell folks at home for it will worry Nellie."

EDITOR'S NOTE—Nellie is John's best girl. She knows all about it and does not worry, for she believes he will be all right soon. John's friends all hope for his speedy recovery.

Killed by Fast Freight

Peter Burke, a conductor on the Lake Shore railroad was accidently killed about one mile west of Edgerton Tuesday morning. Mr. Burke was a conductor on a west bound fast freight train. It is supposed that he fell off the train while it was running at a fast rate. He was picked up and taken to Edgerton. His home was in Toledo, where he was taken later for burial. Mr. Burke was a man of about 42 years of age and leaves one child. He has a number of acquaintances in and around Butler who will greatly mourn his death.

SKIN TROUBLES CURED.

Two Little Girls Had Eczema Very Badly—In One Case Child's Hair Came Out and Left Bare Patches—Cuticura Met with Success.

"I have two little girls who have been troubled very badly with eczema. One of them had it on her lower limbs. I did everything that I could hear of for her, but it did not give in until warm weather, when it seemingly subsided. The next winter when it became cold the eczema started again and also in her head where it would take the hair out and leave bare patches. At the same time her arms were sore the whole length of them. I took her to a physician, but the child grew worse all the time. Her sister's arms were also affected. I began using the Cuticura Remedies, and by the time the second lot was used their skin was soft and smooth. Mrs. Charles Baker, Albion, Me., Sept. 21, 1908."

"Did you ever try gardening?" asked Mr. Crosslots.

"Once," answered the man who always has a discouraged look. "By the time I had read all the publications necessary to inform me on the subject, the season for flowers and vegetables was over."—Washington Star.

NEW VIGOR FOR BAD BACKS.

How to Make a Weak Back Better.

Women who suffer with backache, bearing-down pains, dizziness, constant dull, tired feelings, will find hope in the advice of Mrs. M. Working, 315 Fulton Ave., Rochester, Ind., who said: "I suffered everything with pain in the back, too frequent passages of the kidney secretions, swelling of the ankles and joints and a general feeling of weakness. I used about everything said to be good for kidney trouble, but Doan's Kidney Pills brought me the first real help and three boxes cured me."

Drawing the Class Line.

I was directing the play. The girl parts were of slight consequence, so a friend of mine shook an old promise in my face. I had told him I would some day cast a girl whom he knew, and whose friends had made it nearly a duty with him. So I cast the girl, says Paul Armstrong in relating his experiences with stage-struck girls in Success Magazine. In the play she was a college girl visiting at a Western ranch. It needed little, save an ability to appreciate that type of girl, to play the part, so all were happy—the girl, the man I had promised, and I—it was necessary with me.

Now I needed a girl to play a Mexican servant. She did not speak a line, and the part, being but color in the scene, paid scarcely what could be called a salary.

I had received a very well written letter from a girl, who asked me, if I saw a certain play, to notice a girl in a mob scene wearing a certain costume different from the others.

The letter impressed me. Here was a girl who was working as a "super" at no more than a dollar a night, who was trying to learn her stage that way; trying to get a position by doing something that somebody would notice.

It was likely a week after I received the letter that I saw the play. And I saw her. She "gave something" to the scene.

I sent for her and cast her for the part of the servant. As there were but four women in the play, they were all introduced.

And in two days I knew that the girl whose friend had induced me to give her a part would never be an actress. Why? Because being cast in a play as a guest at the ranch, she would not associate socially at rehearsals with the girl who was to play the servant at the ranch.

The Sort of Man He Is.

"He is. Cook at the steak is far more interesting to him than Cook at the pole!"—Cleveland Plain Dealer.

CAREFUL DOCTOR

Prescribed Change of Food Instead of Drugs.

It takes considerable courage for a doctor to deliberately prescribe only food for a despairing patient, instead of resorting to the usual list of medicines.

There are some truly scientific physicians among the present generation who recognize and treat conditions as they are and should be treated regardless of the value to their pockets. Here's an instance:

"Four years ago I was taken with severe gastritis and nothing would stay on my stomach, so that I was on the verge of starvation.

"I heard of a doctor who had a summer cottage near me—a specialist from N. Y., and as a last hope, sent for him.

"After he examined me carefully he advised me to try a small quantity of Grape-Nuts at first, then as my stomach became stronger to eat more.

"I kept at it and gradually got so I could eat and digest three teaspoonfuls. Then I began to have color in my face, memory became clear, where before everything seemed a blank. My limbs got stronger and I could walk. So I steadily recovered.

"Now after a year on Grape-Nuts I weigh 153 lbs. My people were surprised at the way I grew fleshy and strong on this food."

Read the little book, "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs.

AMERICA'S LARGEST AND MOST BEAUTIFUL SCOTTISH RITE CATHEDRAL

Consecrated and Dedicated at Fort Wayne, Indiana, Wednesday Evening, November Seventeenth, 1909.

The Estimated Cost of This Beautiful Cathedral Finished and Furnished Will be About $275,000

The Cathedral is designed in a modification of Sixteenth Century Gothic Architecture, united with that Mediaeval spirit closely associated with Masonic Guilds.

To the uninitiated as well as the initiated, there is presented a certain relationship that cannot be misunderstood, which truths are intended to delight the eye, and the deep inculcations to develop the soul.

The building covers an area of 80 ft. in width by 130 ft. in depth, with the exception of the front, which has a width of 88 feet, and a vestibule projection of 13 feet, with the steps starting directly from the sidewalk, making the full depth of the building occupy the full depth of lot, 150 feet.

The building is thoroughly fire-proof in its construction, has an exterior of Indiana Oolitic limestone, with a combination of smooth and rock face. The roof is constructed of steel and concrete and covered with red tile. The height of the building above the sidewalk is about 85 feet. The four corners are emphasized with low towers or pavilions, which provides space for stairways and elevators, and are entirely separated from the other parts of the building. The approach to the building is up a broad flight of five steps into a vestibule, 30x11 feet, continuing five additional steps to the first floor, which has an elevation of 6 feet above the sidewalk. The entrance directly is into a Gothic hall, 30x17 feet. At the right is the passenger elevator. At the left is a stairway, six feet in width, leading to the basement and to the floors above.

In the basement of the building, which has an elevation of five feet above the sidewalk, is the check room, 48x21 feet, a Men's Toilet Room, Billiard Room and Bowling Alley.

Besides these conveniences, provision is made for the heating and ventilation apparatus, Fuel Room, Work Shop and Custodian's Room.

This latter is reached by a side rear entrance, also serving as means of egress for assistants at the time of a Convocation Banquet, musicians and other conveniences.

On the first floor is the Banquet Hall, size 77x82 feet, and a ceiling of 16 feet, with a balcony at the front for visitors and at the rear for musicians. The Banquet Floor and Gallery provides a seating space for one thousand.

Immediately in the rear of the Banquet Hall, is the Kitchen, 60x24 feet, provided with the necessary cold storage and dish pantry, and all modern conveniences.

The second floor is adapted to the social features of the building, and provides for a Ladies' Parlor, 23x33 feet.

In the center of the building, including the "Approach" over the front entrance, is the Library, 30x62 feet. Directly back of the Library and Ladies' Parlor is the Social Room, 54x48 feet, and in immediate connection with the Social Room is the Lodge of Perfection Room, or business room of the Bodies. All these rooms open en-suite with large sliding doors. In connection with the Library and Stair Hall is the Secretary's Office, 22x17 feet.

The extreme rear of the building, previously referred to as the Kitchen, is separated from the other portion of the building by brick walls, which extend up to the Auditorium Floor, and there form a space for the stage.

This space, 51x16 feet, on the Social Room floor, separated by brick walls, provides accommodation for Officers' Robing and Dressing Rooms. In connection with this is a Toilet Room and an Officers' Retiring Room. These rooms are reached by a special stairway from the side rear entrance, reaching the Kitchen floor and to the stage.

The Consistory Auditorium is on the third floor, and is provided with a scenic stage, 60x24 feet in depth, with a full depth of the stage of 32 feet and a proscenium opening of 35 feet. This stage has an elevation of two feet above the floor, with a floor working space in front of 41x56 feet. In connection with the stage, are Property Rooms, Fly Galleries and a thorough equipment of stage scenery. The Auditorium is 75x84 feet, and is arranged on three sides in an amphi-theatre form, the first tier of seats being at an elevation of four feet above the floor, and they then rise in tiers two and one-half feet each to the height of six tiers on the sides and to the height of eight tiers at the end. This arrangement provides for the seating capacity of five hundred and fifty. On this floor underneath the amphi-theatre is provided space for Candidates' Room, Assembly Room, and Ritual Work Rooms. There is a 14-foot wide corridor across the front of the building, connecting Stair Hall and Elevator Hall, with a private entry room between Corridor and Consistory Auditorium. The Consistory Auditorium has a height of 35 feet, provided with a groined and arched ceiling, carrying with it the characteristics of the Cathedral.

The entrance vestibule has a dark Tennessee Marble wainscoating 7 feet high and groined ceilings in the Vestibule and Stair Hall. Roman Mosaic Floors, with Masonic Emblems, and all floors throughout the building except in the Banquet Hall, Social Rooms and Stage Floor will be Marble Granito and cement.

The heating system is by vacuum steam. The ventilation is controlled by an automatic temperature regulation system.

The windows are designed to harmonize with the architecture and Masonic spirit of the building, with ornamentation and emblems symbolic of Scottish Rite Masonry. The memorial windows on the west side of the first floor are emblematic of the progress of man from youth to old age, and the several Masonic virtues, particularly those of Life, Truth, Justice, Faith, Hope and Charity.

Over the inside vestibule doors, forming a part of the Entrance Hall, is a large memorial art glass transom, with the emblem of an active 33° Mason and figures of Faith and Hope.

The lighting fixtures are treated with decorative art glass, similar to that used in the windows, thus preserving a continuation of the color tones of the windows, creating a soft mellow atmosphere in the building.

The decoration of the walls, and principally those of the Consistory Auditorium, are in warm gray tones, softly emphasizing the particular elements of the constructional work, and preserves the spaciousness and loftiness characteristic of a Cathedral.

The decoration of the Arch forming proscenium to stage, is laid on a field of gold, yellow and spiritual color, with interlacing vines, symbol of fraternity, the wild rose, typifying the Rose Croix or Faith, and oak leaves, the victories and strength of the Crusaders, mingled between are represented the titles and emblems of all the degrees from the Fourth to the Double Eagle of the Thirty-second, which crowns the apex of the opening, each typified with its individual colors, supported on either side with chivalric figures of Sts. John and Sts. Andrew. A large mural painting, with allegorical figures, symbolizing Charity, occupies a place in the Entrance Hall over the doors to the Banquet Hall.

At the north end of the Consistory Amphi-theatre is the grand organ, which in size and volume is equal to any of the large organs in the country, and is provided with an echo organ and a set of twenty chimes.

The mystic imagination uses nature only as an alphabet with which to spell spiritual meanings; it creates such forms of wonder, mystery and beauty as are sculptured on the walls of Egyptian temples, it assembles the stones of a Cathedral according to laws as organic as those which determine the course of the stars.

Architecture thus becomes a living art, for architecture deals in visible symbols, and visible symbols form the language of Scottish Rite Masonry.

Civil War Stories

Explosion of the Sultana.

On the 24th of April, 1865, all the paroled men left at Vicksburg were put on board the Sultana for home. You who have been at the front and in prison can recall the thrill these words sent through you, when, after years of suffering and danger, it was echoed through the camp—"going home." We had starved, some of us eight and others twelve months in rebel prisons, and were nearly wild with joy as we stepped on board the steamer, little dreaming so many of us would never leave it alive. Nothing occurred to give us any uneasiness during the first two days, and after a few hours spent at Memphis unloading sugar, we again started up stream. It was late in the night when we left Memphis, and the most of the men were asleep. I was caring for a sick comrade of the same company, and we had a comfortable place between the smokestacks where it was quite warm, and were soon fast asleep. At about 3 a. m. of the 27th, we were awakened—and such an awakening. My first real sense of what had occurred was from the steam and coal-smoke coming up from the exploded boiler, and I was badly scalded, and nearly suffocated. I could not see, but thought of my companion, and reached out my hand, but he was gone. I called his name, and got no answer. Then I thought I would get down to the lower deck and see what was to be done, but when I tried I could only move my hands and feet. The hurricane deck had been torn in two, and the front end had fallen on me in such a manner as to fasten me, while it did not cause me any pain. I cannot say how long I was kept there, very likely but a few minutes, but it seemed hours to me until a sudden jar of the boat loosened me, and taking advantage of it I was soon scrambling up the slanting deck, looking for a place to get down. A rope hanging from a spar seemed the only way, and seizing it I was soon among the hundreds of frightened men below. There was no one to give any command, and every one seemed wild with fear and excitement. I looked for something to float, but could not find a thing. Meanwhile the flames were fast licking up the shattered boat, and it was plain we must soon trust ourselves to the water.

I walked to the lower side of the boat, but the sight that met my gaze made me return. The water was thick with men who had jumped in and others were jumping as fast as they could get a chance, striking and sinking those beneath only in turn to be sunk by the next that jumped. Realizing that our time was about up, I repaired to the other side, where only one man was to be seen, and thinking it the safest, sprang in, to be chased by him. He was a good swimmer, but scared; and it scared me too when I saw his eyes and heard him calling me to save him. If he had got hold of me it would have been the last of both of us, so I put in a few good strokes and escaped him. After swimming nearly or quite three miles, I got to some willows and clung to them until 8 a. m. when the Silver Spray took off about fifty of us who had got to that place. We were taken to Memphis, where we were cared for until another boat could take us, when we were sent home. Out of the 2,300 men on board the Sultana, three out of every four died there, with home and peace almost within sight. It was the saddest sight human eye ever witnessed.—One of the Survivors.

"Lest We Forget."

"Yes," Mrs. Marshall said, with a sigh, returning from the kitchen, where a pretty mulatto girl went about her work as if her mere presence there were a condescension, "Eliza is by no means trustworthy—not even always courteous. She can do good work when she tries, but—I'm afraid she doesn't often try. As they used to say on the plantation, she's 'trifling.'"

"I simply wouldn't keep her," a visiting cousin declared. "The daily wear and tear on your patience—why, she isn't worth it!"

"Well, I don't know," Mrs. Marshall returned, taking up her sewing again, "maybe she isn't. And yet—it seems to me we owe those people patience; we owe them so much, we Southerners. I never can forget those four years of love and loyalty to us women and children, when every man was at the front and we were so completely dependent on their care. Over and again they deprived themselves of the barest necessities—went cold and hungry—that we might not suffer. Why, if it hadn't been for Eliza's grandmother——" and she told us the simple story, the counterpart of which is doubtless known in hundreds of homes throughout the South.

It was during the closing months of the war. The last half of the last loaf of bread had been reached. It was not safe to stir beyond the immediate dooryard. Foraging, indeed, would have been to small purpose, as the whole countryside had been laid waste. Two little children, their delicate mother and old black "mammy" had been living from day to day in the forlorn hope that "something would happen." Otherwise that half-loaf of bread with a very small strip of bacon were all that stood between them and stark starvation.

Gray-haired Mammy Chloe was overheard praying in the empty pantry:

"De good Lawd hep dis nigga not tech dem victuals!" the tears following in quick succession down her cheeks, the bread and meat on the shelf before her. "Gawd come down an' quell de achin' empties in dese here insides an' fill 'em wid de grace o' de Lawd! Hep me wrastle wid temptation forty days an' forty nights"—here a convulsive sob was stifled, apronwise—"ef need be, but gin me strengt' to cut dat bread an' meat wid-out tastin' so much as a crumb."

The hushed voice frayed off into a sigh of real physical weakness as the suppliant rose from her knees and laid her hand on the bread-knife preparatory to serving "dinner."—Youth's Companion.

Our First Big Scare.

In February, 1862, General Boyle's Brigade was ordered from Columbia, Ky., to Mill Springs, to take part in what is now known in history as the Zollicoffer battle. In promulgating this order General Boyle was careful to instruct regimental commanders that no foraging upon the citizens along the route would be tolerated. The regiment to which I belonged had one of those fellows who always find some way to evade orders, and get what the country affords for their own use. This fellow was a member of Company G, Nineteenth Ohio Volunteers, and was known all through the regiment as Buckskin. How he acquired this cognomen I am unable to tell, but presume in some way that was no credit to him. On the morning of the march "Buck" came to me and wanted a mule for the day, telling me that he had a lame leg and was unable to march, but was anxious to participate in the expected battle, and did not want to be left behind. Unfortunately for "Buck"—as the sequel will show—I had an old mule that was not in use, and I told him that so brave and patriotic a soldier as he seemed to be could have the use of that mule, and thereby get a chance to be shot. "Buck" improvised a saddle and bridle, and mounted the old relic and started—not with the regiment but with the wagon-train—but was hardly clear of the town until he started across the country on his own hook. Buck was very successful that day and had captured some half dozen chickens and turkeys and headed toward the camp where he judged the troops would halt for the night. But it grew dark long before old "Buck" could get any definite information as to the whereabouts of the troops. He had gone beyond the camping ground, and as he now found that no troops had passed the point where he struck the main road, he started back to meet the troops, and, seeing a bright fire in the middle of the road, did not like the looks of things, so tied his mule by the wayside and proceeded to investigate on foot, getting close enough to discover that the obstruction was a picket post and composed of men from the Nineteenth Ohio. "Buck" went back, mounted his mule, and, putting spurs to the same, he came tearing down the road, shouting, "The rebs are coming!—the rebs are coming!" At every jump the chickens squalled and flopped, the turkeys gobbled—all together making such an uncouth racket that the picket fled, followed by old "Buck," who drove them into camp and caused the long roll to be beaten, getting the entire brigade under arms. "Buck" got to quarters with his provender, but on quiet being restored and the matter being investigated, he was doomed to wear a ball and chain for twenty days, doing extra duty the while. Thus ended our first big scare and first call to arms by the long roll.—Chicago Ledger.

A Terrible Scene.

In reading these war memories my mind goes back over those scenes of danger and death, and fastens upon one, the most solemn and awful to me, that came under my observation during those trying times. Time, spring of 1864; place, camps near Dalton, Ga. Fourteen stakes planted firmly in the ground, fourteen men tied to those stakes, fourteen white pine coffins, one behind each stake; a white handkerchief tied over each man's face; the provost guard drawn up in front of the victims, and twenty thousand soldiers massed in the valley to witness the execution. I see the guard make ready, the commandant lowers a handkerchief—a rattle of musketry. I see some of the victims shrink, while others stand bolt upright. I see the dirt fly up in the rear of the condemned men, and I know some of the guard have missed purposely; the doctors pass along the line of the condemned and feel of their pulse. The rear rank of the guard advance to within a few feet of the victims, single out certain individuals, make ready and fire. No missing this time; the heads of the remaining victims fall forward, the ghastly scene is over. I wondered then, I wonder now, if such a sacrifice was necessary.

We start back to camp, our heads bowed down by the awful scene we had just witnessed. No one spoke for some time, when a fellow by the name of Dave Defriese says: "Boys, I'll bet we have to git out here in less than three days." "Why?" some one asked. "Because leaders that will have men treated that way will never prosper." Sure enough, it was not very many days before Sherman flanked us out of that position and we commenced falling back toward Atlanta. I was slightly acquainted with three of those men who were executed that day. They appeared to be passably good men. The charge against all fourteen was desertion.

Military Piety.

During the Civil War the late Colonel Gabe Bouck organized a regiment which he controlled as a dictator.

"I am a humble servant of the Lord," said an itinerant evangelist who had wandered into camp one day, "endeavoring to save the souls of the unfortunate. I have just left the camp of the —th Massachusetts, where I was instrumental in leading eight men into the paths of righteousness."

"Adjutant," thundered Col. Bouck, after a moment's pause, "detail ten men for baptism. No d—d Massachusetts regiment shall beat mine for piety."—From Success Magazine.

Good Reason for a Charge.

At the siege of Fredericksburg, when the Confederates were enduring even more than their usual pangs of hunger, one of the southern skirmishing parties made a sudden raid on an unsuspecting federal brigade. After some interchange of firing the assailants rushed upon their disconcerted enemy. One emaciated Johnny hurriedly emptied the knapsack of a prostrate soldier, and, straightening up, regardless of blades and bullets, waved his booty above his head. "Charge 'em, boys, charge 'em!" he yelled. "They've got cheese!"

The Doctor's Gift.

Dr. Robert Glynn-Clobery, a delightful old character described in "Reminiscences of Cambridge," was a fellow of King's College, where he resided. During a long illness he attended a poor man, of whose family party a pert, talkative magpie made one, and as the patient observed that Dr. Glynn-Clobery always, when paying a visit, had some joke with the bird, he thought that perhaps the doctor might like to possess it.

Accordingly, when the poor man was well again, with overflowing gratitude, but with no money to pay a bill, he thought he could do no better than make his kind friend a present of the magpie; and so the prisoner in its cage was conveyed to his rooms in King's College.

The bearer met with a kind reception, but was desired to carry the bird back with him.

"I cannot," said the doctor, "take so good care of it as you can; but I shall consider it mine, and I entrust it to you to keep for me; and as long as it lives I will pay you half a crown weekly for its maintenance."

The readers of this paper will be pleased to learn that there is at least one dreaded disease that science has been able to cure in all its stages, and that is Catarrh. Hall's Catarrh Cure is the only positive cure now known to the medical fraternity. Catarrh being a constitutional disease, requires a constitutional treatment. Hall's Catarrh Cure is taken internally, acting directly upon the blood and mucous surfaces of the system, thereby destroying the foundation of the disease, and giving the patient strength by building up the constitution and assisting nature in doing its work. The proprietors have so much faith in its curative powers that they offer One Hundred Dollars for any case that it fails to cure. Send for list of testimonials.

"Mix half ounce of Concentrated pine compound with two ounces of glycerine and half a pint of good whiskey; shake well each time and use in doses of a teaspoonful to a tablespoonful every four hours."

These ingredients can be obtained from any good druggist, or he will get them from his wholesale house.

The Concentrated pine is a special pine product and comes only in half ounce bottles, each enclosed in an air-tight case, but be sure it is labeled "Concentrated."

A prominent local druggist says that he has filled this prescription hundreds of times and that it is wonderfully effective.

Straight Talk to Stage-Struck Girls.

That gives the stage six thousand girls a year, says Paul Armstrong in Success Magazine. Of course they do not all get on, but they try.

Eliminating at once those who aim at the musical comedy stage, we come to those who "want to act."

As to preparation, study, voice, or physique, they seldom take thought. They are restless, idle and vain, and they know, because they once recited the "Wreck of the Hesperus" or "The Death of Little Jim," that they "have talent."

Of course, some one has told them. Some idiot of a man or fool woman has breathed into their ears that poisonous query, "Why don't you go on the stage?"

And that has settled it. The girl begins to talk of it, dream of it, read about it, think it over, worry her folks until they—likely for self-protection—say, Go!"

And then we get her.

The danger from slight cuts or wounds is always blood poisoning. The immediate application of Hamlins Wizard Oil makes blood poisoning impossible.

Dark Philosophy.

The old-time darky is often a keen philosopher and an excellent judge of human nature.

One of these typical old "aunties" was sitting in a California street car when a southern woman boarded it. In this land of the "progressive colored person," the old negro looked like a letter from home to the southern woman, who immediately opened conversation.

The car stopped to take on a flashily-dressed blonde who ostentatiously seated herself between the southern woman and the negro (the seats in the car being the long side seats), then noticing her proximity to the negro, just as ostentatiously removed herself to the seat across the car. The old darky looked at the southern woman with a sly twinkle in her eye.

"Honey," she said softly, "if any o' her family had ever owned anything like me, she's jess as leave set in my lap."

Remedies are Needed

Were we perfect, which we are not, medicines would not often be needed. But since our systems have become weakened, impaired and broken down through indiscretions, which have gone on from the early ages, through countless generations, remedies are needed to aid Nature in correcting our inherited and otherwise acquired weaknesses. To reach the seat of stomach weakness and consequent digestive troubles, there is nothing so good as Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery, a glyceric compound, extracted from native medicinal roots—sold for over forty years with great satisfaction to all users. For Weak Stomach, Biliousness, Liver Complaint, Pain in the Stomach after eating, Heartburn, Bad Breath, Belching of food, Chronic Diarrhea and other Intestinal Derangements, the "Discovery" is a time-proven and most efficient remedy.

The genuine has on its outside wrapper the Signature R. V. Pierce M.D.

You can't afford to accept a secret nostrum as a substitute for this non-alcoholic, medicine OF KNOWN COMPOSITION, not even though the urgent dealer may thereby make a little bigger profit.

Dr. Pierce's Pleasant Pellets regulate and invigorate stomach, liver and bowels. Sugar-coated, tiny granules, easy to take as candy.

STOP! LOOK! LISTEN!

A TALK WITH THE SIGNALMAN

I asked the man, "What is Block signaling?"

"The block," said he, "is a length of track which, on double-track roads, has at its entrance a post and movable arm; and on single-track lines one at each end. When you read that a line has every inch protected by this system, it means the entire line is divided, into consecutive blocks."

"Is it universally used?"

"No. There's only one line from Chicago to New York thus protected, and of the total in the United States one-third is on the Union and Southern Pacific.

"Take three blocks at the beginning of a line with a train in each. Train in first must not move to second until the train in second goes to third, and train in second must not go into third until third moves to fourth.

"As number three goes into fourth, it tells train in two it has done so, and train in two going into block three makes the movable arm say to train in one, 'Come on, I've gone into block two.'

"As an illustration, let's take three connecting rooms at your home, communicating without doors. Now attach on the right hand—going from the front to the back—of each door frame a movable stick which can be pushed to right angles with the door frame, or pointed down about as you would point your arm at a spot on the floor two feet from you. Got that? Your stick represents the 'semaphore,' or arm. Now, then, the middle room is your private office. Your servant knows by the arm being at right angles she must not enter, and when you are not in there the stick will point downward at 60 degrees and she may usher a visitor in.

"All very simple you say; but on a busy morning you rush in your office and forget to change the arm to denote occupied. The servant ushers in the last person in the world you want there, just there—and the scheme is a disastrous failure. Then you improve so the stick left to itself will remain firmly at right angles. Can't forget that, you figure. Next thing you do is to forget to change the position of the stick. The employe sees signal 'occupied' and turns away an important client with disaster almost equal to that caused by admitting the one she shouldn't.

"You change things so the stick will move from right angle to pointing to the floor, when you are not in your office. You can in walking from the front room into your office release the arm, which will go to horizontal; it will stay in that position as long as you are in there; and when you walk out of your office into the back room it will be pulled down to indicate you have vacated; and your employe may take the next caller in.

"In other words, you have changed this device from a possible human forgetfulness to a positive mechanical performance; you have an automatic signal.

"Substitute the consecutive lengths of a railway for your rooms, and you have the block signal.

"Then, as I understand it, a semaphore arm located at the entrance to a block set at right angle to the post is a signal to an approaching train to 'stop,' and when pointing diagonally toward the ground means 'keep on going?' "Yes."

"You call it automatic?"

"It is. Just as your stick is kept at 60 degrees incline, when your office is vacant, so is the semaphore arm on the line when a block is unoccupied. When a train enters a block it affects the energy which is part of automatic signaling, so that the arm goes to and remains horizontal as long as the block is occupied."

"You build these signals so their normal position is stop and then you apply a force that makes them show keep going. Why is this?"

"Because the trains must keep going. They have not only the problems of safety, but of hurry up. They work by minutes, and seconds. The first duty is safety. Having that checked, the automatic hangs out the signal to keep moving. Only when something occurs does this scheme cause signal to go to stop position."

"What's the energy you referred to?" "Electric current." "Where does it come from?" "Battery near each post." "How is it worked?" "The rails of each block are made just as if all one piece, by connecting with joints with wire. Then connecting the extreme ends forms a complete circuit. The current flows in this circuit. Machinery made out of experience, wheels, springs and things is moved by this current and its movements either hold the arm down or permit it to stay horizontal.

"With no train in block, the current makes the mechanism pull the arm down and hold it there. When a train enters a block it destroys this combination. The wheels and axles combined with the rails make a shorter circuit. Electric current deserts the longer for the shorter way round. The energy that held the arm down is withdrawn, and up it swings to horizontal.

"Each block is independent of all other blocks. When the last wheels of a train leave it, the current resumes its flow, and the signal arm away back at the entrance is pulled down to proceed. Before the hind wheels have ceased doing what I've just stated, the front wheels of the locomotive have entered the next block and repeated what it did in the previous blocks."

"How about the single track?" "The automatic arrangement is the same, only there is a signal at each end."

"Isn't it a possible thing for a train to enter a single track at one end on the same instant another enters at the opposite end? What then?"

"Yes—but we have that taken care of. On double track, a train through the signal talks only to the train behind. On the single track it not only talks back, but also to one which may be coming from the opposite direction. This is done by the current overlapping from one block to the next. Before the entrance to a single-track block is reached the train sets a stop signal at the far end of the block it is about to enter. And as it enters the block it also sets the entrance signal to stop, just as is done on double-track."

"How does an engineer know before he sees the home arm what it will signal?"

"We put up another signal from a half mile to a mile from the entrance to a block—in the direction from which the train approaches. It is called 'Distant.' The one at the entrance is called the 'Home' signal. The distant indicates the position of home signal, see?"

"Is the distant distinguished from the home signal, to aid the engineer?"

"Yes, the 'Distant' is painted yellow, with black bar, and has a forked end; the 'Home' red, with white bar and square end."

"You said a while ago the stop signal is displayed only when something occurs. Anything but trains occur?"

"Now you touch the most important feature of the outfit, and the principal reason why the arm is made so that when left to itself it will stay firmly at stop. As it is constructed it cannot show anything but stop, unless the entire combination of rails, wire, current, magnet, etc., are working perfectly. If a wire parts, a rail breaks, a battery fails, a switch point opens the slightest, then the combination fails, the arm is released and resumes horizontal position. The engineer knows, you see, when signal says stop; there may be a train, an open switch, a break in the track or in the signaling apparatus."

"What is done at night, when the semaphore arm cannot be seen?"

"Lights of several colors are used on these same posts. These are seen through spectacles in the butt or weighted end of the arm, and are displayed and obscured, according to the signal."

"Why the name spectacle?"

"That's what it is. The light is white or ordinary flame color, supplied by an eight-day lamp. It will burn eight days without replenishing, although all lamps are refilled every four or five days. When the home signal is in stop position, the engineer sees the flame through a red glass. That's stop, and it is used only in the home signals; if distant signal is at caution he sees through yellow glass. Yellow is used only to the distant signal. It tells the engineer it is the distant, and to be prepared to stop at the home signal. He may see through green glass. That means proceed, and is used in both home and distant signal."

"What does a white light mean?"

"Well, it is so easy to have we don't dare use it. As a white light on a semaphore can be displayed by breaking spectacle glasses, you can understand why it is impossible in our scheme."

"How about places where two or more lines cross at grade?"

"The general principle, movements of arm by day, and colors of light at night, are the same, but being greatly complicated all signals are controlled by levers operated by men from a central station. The crossings and continuous tracks are governed by the interlocking system.

"When in perfect order and unoccupied it displays stop to every track approaching the crossing. The block, you remember, shows proceed, under such conditions. Any change from stop in interlocking must be made by the signalman. To display proceed, he must first lock all other approaches with the stop displayed. He cannot possibly do otherwise. After he has signaled the train to proceed he cannot change the route until the train has moved over and out of the interlocking region."

"Does a train entering an interlocking region set the home signal stop, same as in the block system?"

"Yes. Interlocking plants extend from the crossing 3,190 feet out each track, where distant signals are placed. The home signals are 550 feet from crossing. Only the signalman can display proceed; but the train automatically sets the stop signal.

"Now, my friend, I have given you all the principal features of both systems. There are numerous variations, each specially adapted to some peculiar condition. In yards where there are many tracks and little room for posts, bridges are used. Where there are diverging tracks, two or more of these arms are placed on one post—and so on."

"Are all lines completely equipped in this manner?"

"No. There are about 11,000 miles. The only line thus protected every inch from Chicago to California is via the Northwestern, Union and Southern Pacific. One-third of the 11,000 miles of automatic signaling is on the Harriman lines—and the Northwestern has more miles of double-track automatic than any other railway."

"'He does, sir.'

"'He does, eh? And what does he shy at?'

"'At lots of things, sir.'

"'At lots of things! That is no answer. Tell me some particular thing he'd shy at.'

"'Well, he'd shy at you, sir,' said the groom."

FARM NOTES

Beef Cattle Fed on Silage.

During recent years a number of the state experimental stations have carried on a series of experiments which have demonstrated that silage can advantageously be fed to beef cattle. The Tennessee Experimental Station has especially given close attention to this matter, probably more so than any other station, and in one of its bulletins shows how silage increases the carrying capacity of the land. Ordinarily from two to three acres of blue grass is required to carry a 1,000-pound steer after six months, when gaining from 300 to 400 pounds. Four 800-pound steers were fed for 150 days on the production of less than an acre of land in the form of silage and gained 866 pounds during that period.

When beef is raised on long that is high-priced, the above facts show especial strength in favor of silage. In 1903 a feed test was carried on by the Michigan Station for the purpose of ascertaining the relative number of pounds of beef that could be produced from corn fed in the form of silage, in the form of shock corn and in the form of corn and corn meal. The corn was secured from three different pieces of land, each nearly an acre in size. In addition to the corn fed in this manner the steers were fed daily rations of 5 pounds of corn and cob meal, 2 pounds of oil meal and 4 pounds of clover hay. After the experiment had continued for twelve weeks the average daily gain of the steers had been as follows: For the silage-fed lot, 2.22 pounds; for the shock-fed, 2.02, and for the corn and cob meal lot, 1.89 pounds. While it may be argued that this experiment should be repeated before conclusions can be drawn from it, still so far as these figures go the results were in favor of harvesting the corn in form of silage.

Possibilities of Our Farm Lands.

From the standpoint of the most reliable and recent investigations and information, our land, handled in accordance with certain natural laws that determine its proper cultivation, will not only furnish food and clothing for an immensely greater population for ages, but will supply fuel and light and power when coal and petroleum shall have been exhausted. But we must look to better methods of soil usage for the alternative of bringing under cultivation unused and abandoned swampy conditions, although adding a vast total to our cultivable fields, will not always suffice to meet the growing demand. Already many sections of congested population are calling upon outside sources for food, and many of the large cities at times actually suffer from vegetable famines. Such shortages are due to more or less local and abnormal conditions, but might become general and permanent unless wise foresight should make provision for feeding our rapidly increasing population.

The producing possibility of our cultivable lands becomes almost inconceivable to the mind when we consider that only a small proportion of the land nominally in farms is actually under cultivation, and that our acreage yields are ridiculously low in comparison with those of highly developed agricultural countries like Germany, France and England, notwithstanding that our soils are naturally as productive, says the American Review of Reviews.

Four Horse Reins.

A correspondent asks how can a pair of lines be rigged up for four horses so that each horse will have a line to each side of bit, thus doing away with the tying together of horses heads.

The two sketches indicate arrangements of lines that should prove satisfactory. In the first illustration A A A A are two-horse reins and checks; B B are short ropes with snaps and C C are bridle reins on inside of bridle with snaps to snap in check buckle on reins.

Dairy Farm Implements.

Every dairyman should endeavor to have as many labor-saving appliances around and in his barn as possible. For instance, the removal of manure from a dairy barn entails a great deal of hard work. However, the work may be greatly lessened if the farmers will install a manure carrier, which runs on a track. These carriers cost little in comparison to the amount of labor they save.

Every dairy farmer should have a manure spreader. One spreader may do the work of several men in the spreading of manure on the fields. The manure is spread more evenly and each ton returns more value for this reason. No dairy farmer can afford to be without a manure spreader. But he should buy a standard make.—Inland Farmer.

For Barb Wire Cuts.

When a horse has been injured on wire the first thing to do is to stop the flow of blood; this may as a rule be done by bandaging it up tight. It may also frequently be best to apply powdered alum or common saleratus, both of which will generally be found effective. In a few hours, considerable swelling will set in; this should be reduced either by applying cold water frequently, or, what is really better, applying pure kerosene oil, not only to the wound, but also to the swollen parts. No bandage should be kept on where kerosene is used, as it will then cause the hair to fall off temporarily, and as soon as it is safe to do so, the sore should be carefully washed with soft water and castile soap. This ought to be repeated daily until the sore heals. One of the best healing medicines for horse flesh that I have ever used can be put up at any drug store, as follows: One-half pint of alcohol, one-half pint of spirits of turpentine, one ounce of pure glycerine; mix all together in a large bottle and shake well before using. Apply only with a feather at morning and night. The sore should never be bandaged. By daily washing it will in this way heal up very rapidly. I can personally testify to the effectiveness of this simple remedy, as we have made use of it in numerous cases, with the best results, where every other remedy we tried failed to heal up the sore on the horse.—Agricultural Epitomist.

Hot Water Heater.

As a means of providing hot water for washing in the kitchen or for cleaning and sterlizing dairy utensils the tank shown in the illustration is simple and cheap. Any stove in which the iron coils can be heated will serve the purpose.

Fall Care of Poultry.

The fall of the year is the time to buy pure bred stock, whether of males only or of both sexes. Breeders do not keep over winter more than enough to complete their breeding pens, and will readily dispose of their surplus stock at a fair price. It is better to buy fowls in the fall than to procure eggs of pure breeds in the spring. A pair of hens will lay perhaps 250 eggs—at least 100 of them being early in the season—thus producing a large number of chicks and avoiding the shipment of eggs by express and the likelihood of breakage. It will be still cheaper, if buying pure breeds, to procure half a dozen, a male and five pullets, as they will cost less proportionately and give an opportunity for hatching chicks quite early in the spring without being compelled to wait too long to secure a setting of eggs. It will pay every one interested in poultry to use pure breeds, and the fall is the best time to buy them.—Field and Farm.

Preserving Beef.

When the animal heat is all out and the meat thoroughly cooled, cut it into convenient sized pieces for cooking, weigh out the meat and allow eight pounds of salt to 100 pounds of meat. Sprinkle a light layer of salt in the bottom of a clean, sweet, hardwood barrel or a stone jar, then pack beef in closely to a depth of, say five to seven inches, then put on a layer of salt and so on until the beef is all in, reserving enough salt for a good layer on top of the meat. After the package has stood over night add for each 100 pounds of meat four pounds of sugar, two ounces baking soda and two ounces saltpeter, dissolved in a gallon of tepid water; three gallons more water should cover this quantity. Weight to keep all under the brine.

Strength of Bone in Hogs.

The effect of feed on the strength of bone in pigs forms the text of a bulletin by Nebraska Experiment Station. The experiment shows very marked increase in the strength of bone when tankage or ground bone is fed in addition to corn. In determining the strength of bones the two principal bones in each leg of each animal were removed and broken in a machine. There were four pigs fed in each lot, making the figures given the average of the breaking of thirty-two bones in each lot. The average breaking strength per 100 pounds live weight of hogs after twenty-two weeks feeding was as follows: Lot 1, corn, 325 pounds; lot 2, corn and shorts, 396 pounds; lot 3, corn and skim milk, 509 pounds; lot 4, corn and tankage, 580 pounds; lot 5, corn and ground bone, 681 pounds.

Bees and the Sense of Smell.

Recent experiments on showy flowers like the poppy tend to show that insects are not always attracted to flowers by the brightly colored petals, but rather by the perception—doubtless by means of smell—that there is honey or pollen. In these experiments the unopened flower bud is inclosed in a gauze net, so as to protect it from insects, and when it expands the petals are carefully removed without touching the remaining parts with the fingers (for bees avoid a flower if the smell of human fingers is left on it), and the petalless flowers receive practically as many insect visits as untouched flowers do.

The Tomato Worm.

The big tomato worm, which eats the leaves from the tomato vines is very difficult to see because it so resembles the tomato foliage in color. After they get through eating and mature they drop to the ground and burrow in it, to pass the winter in the chrysalis stage. In the spring, when the garden is plowed or spaded, the chrysalis may be found, and can be recognized by their brown color and "jug-handle" proboscis.

NEW LAW AND ORDER LEAGUE IN DEKALB

AUBURN, Ind., Nov. 29.—Now that DeKalb county has voted "dry" and has shown by the tremendous majority its antipathy for the saloon and the sale of intoxicants as a beverage, the temperance people of the county will see that the liquor laws are enforced and at a meeting at the coliseum in this city this evening the DeKalb Law and Order league was formed.

Branches to the county organization will be placed in evero township and a vigilnce committee of several thousand men and women will be constantly on the alert to ferret out and prosecute any violations of the blind tiger law.

At Garrett last evening the local league of that place was formed and the Rev. A. B. Whitney, pastor of the Baptist church, was named as city president and Mrs. Ad. Stewart was made head of the ladies' auxilary.—Journal Gazette.

Every One is Mean to Me

Dear Mother: I killed myself because every one is mean to me. I no longer want to live. I am sorry I done what I did. You will no longer have any trouble with me, and I do hope you will forgive me for what I have done. Best wishes and good luck to you all of your life. Thank God, I will be with my father.—Elsie Lenhardt.

Leaving the above note and with a photograph of her father clutched in her hands, little Elsie Lenhardt, of Chicago, aged 11 years, turned on the gas, and her little spirit fluttered away to meet Him who said, "Suffer little children to come unto me."

Her spirit was broken by continual punishment and her heart was sad with the thought that no one loved her. The little tot whose very nature craved love and caresses, whose tender years required affectionate care, received it not. The buoyant spirit of childhood was crushed and the kind words that would have made her happy were not spoken. A young life was sacrificed to parental regret. Here is indeed a lesson to be remembered.

The incident brings to mind the following words of Ingersoll, which are appropriate to the occasion:

"If there is one of you here that ever expects to whip your child again, let me ask you something. Have your photograph taken at the time, and let it show your face red with vulgar anger, and the face of the little one, with eyes swimming in tears and the little chin dimpled with fear, looking like a piece of water struck by a sudden cold wind. If that little child should die, I cannot think of a sweeter way to spend an autumn afternoon than to take that photograph and go to the cemetery where the maples are clad in tender gold, and when little scarlet runners are coming, like poems of regret, from the sad heart of the earth, and sit down upon the mound and look at that photograph, and think of the flesh, now dust, that you beat. Just think of it. I could not bear to die in the arms of a child I had whipped. I could not bear to feel upon my lips, when they were withered beneath the touch of death, the kiss of one that I had struck."—LaGrange Call.

Newspaper Men Lock Horns

H. M. Morley, editor of the Angola Herald has filed suit in the DeKalb county circuit court against J. F. Coss former owner of the Ashley Times, asking for judgment in the sum of $500 also the possession of the Ashley Times newspaper offibe. The plaintiff complains of the defendant and charges that he wrongfully and unlawfully obtained possession of the above stated plant and that he has repeatedly demanded possession of the property. He states that the newspaper office is valued at $1000, and he asks the court to grant him judgment of $500 besides the possession of the plant. Sheriff Thomas drove to Ashley Friday afternoon, where he levied upon the Ashley Times in pursuance of his duties and required the defendants to furnish bond in the necessars amounts. It is thought that a hard fought litigation will occur in consedueuce of the action in order to have it decided as to who is entitled to the possession of the property. Mr. Morley is determined to bring about an adjustment of affairs and will leave nothing undone to that end, while J. F. Coss will probably fight equally as hard to retain the plant, and the outcome will be both parties will come out wiser and poorer men, while poor old Aseley—oh well what's the difference?

WHY SALVES FAIL TO CURE ECZEMA

They Clog the Pores—Only a Liquid Can Reach the Inner Skin

Since the old fashioned theory of curing eczema through the blood has been given up by scientists, many different salves have been tried for skin diseases. But it has been found that these salves only clog the pores and can not penetrate to the inner skin below the epidermis where the eczema germs are lodged.

This—the quality of penetrating—probably explains the tremendous success of the only standard liquid eczema cure, oil of wintergreen as compounded in D. D. D. Prescription. After ten years of cure after cure, the world's leading skin specialists have accepted this as the true eczema cure.

We ourselves do not hesitate to recommend D. D. D. Prescription at at $1 00 a bottle, but for the benefit of those who have never tried the prescription, we arranged with the D. D. D. Laboratories of Chicago for a special large trial bottle at 25 cents on a special offer now. This first bottle ought to convince every sufferer, and at any rate, it will surely take away the itch at once. S. G. Stone, Druggist, Butler, Ind.

A Good Ending

Old people are especially prone to stomach, liver and bowel ailments. Old age can be made the pleasantest time of life if these diseases can be avoided. They can be avoided, and cured, by the use of Dr. Calwell's Syrup Pepsin, which cures chronic constipation, dyspepsia, liver troubles, heartburn, sour stomach, flatulency, indigestion, etc. It is absolutely guaranteed to do what we claim, and if you want to try it before buying, send your address for a free sample bottle to pepsin Syrup Co., 119 Caldwell Bldg., Monticello, Ill. It is sold by all druggists at 50c and $1 at bottle. 48-1m

For a Christmas Dinner-Table

In the center of the table set up a small tree, three feet or a little higher; dress it with silver tinsel, silver and red balls, and red and white candles. Old-fashioned red and white candy toys can also be hung by red ribbons and later distributed with joking speeches to the guests for whom they have been chosen—such as pipes, pistols, spades for the men, scissors for the clever sewer, irons, tubs, brooms for the busy housekeepers, a harp for the musican, etc. All these forms can be bought at any candy-maker's establishment.

At holiday-time the candy-makers often use for window decorations, long sticks of clear candy of various colors and an accommodating manager will willingly color a number to order, although they are not, as a rule, made for sale. Those I used were eigntee inches long, one quarter of an inch thick, of clear twisted candy colored a bright red and costing twenty cents a pound.

The table was laid for twelve, and at each plate was placed a tripod made of these sticks, tied together near one end with narrow ribbon and in each tripod hung a little stocking, five inches long some made of red, some of white tarlatan filled with salted nuts and tiny chocolates.

This may sound like a meager decoration, but try it and see how the red sticks stand out against the white cloth and enhanes the glitter of the silver trimmed tree.—Woman's Home Companion for December.

Girl Tells of Hell on Earth

With a description of Hades in which she is living, Miss Elizabeth Magie, tee girl with gray green eyes who three years ago attracted worldwide attention by offering herself for sale to the highest bidder as a young American slave has issued a new servitude in which she says the masses of the American people are living.

In a sociological dissertation of Hel by one who is actually in it Miss Magie tells of the suffering, hardships, embarrasments and unpleasantness she has endured because she is self sustaining.

Here are some of the esigrams from the young woman's statement:

"It is hell to have a superior education and have to work for and obey the commands of ignorance.

"To know that you can do something better tnan other people and never have an opportunity to prove it.

"To hitch your wagon to a star and then have the darned star start off before you get into the wagon.

"To long for a little home, where you can plant and tend a few flowers and have to live in a 8x10 hall bedroom.

"To hang onto a street car strap with seventeen bundles over your arm and see silver-harnessed bulldogs riding by in automobiles.

"To pray for an angel and get a devil.

"To be a poor but honest woman and have men offer you financial assistance on impossible conditions.

"To have a high standard of morality and be called a fool for not violating it for a price.

"To have long-faced sanctimonious cusses tell you that 'the Lord loveth whom he chasteneth'

"To have a clear conscience and clean record and go to bed hungry.

"To be always in debt to the landlady.

The Boosters Aar Pleading

It appears that the Beveridge bureau of boosters in Indiana is alarmed at the prospects for his defeat. If Beveridge is not elected senator again these Beveridge boosters assert that the democrats will control the legislature for ten yeers, and a republican senator during that time will be impossible. The state will be redistricted for legislative purposes and the republicans will be put out in the cold for years to come. The boosters are pleading eloquently for harmony and carry the idea that harmony can only be secured by standing by Beveridge. To stand by Beveridge Indiana republicans must stand for genuine tariff revision—downward revision—and must denounce the Payne-Aldrich tariff law as unjust and unfair to the vast majority of the people, for Mr. Beveridge says so and what Mr. Beveridge says must be approved by all republicans in the state for the sake of harmony and the sake of the party, but more especially for the sake of Mr. Beveridge. Friends of Cannon, Aldrich and Taft should forget their convictions and put on the Beveridge war paint until the democrats of Indiana are licked to a frazzle and Beveridge is safely garbed in a new senatorial robe for another six years. Otherwise the democrats will succeed and may be guilty of gerrymanding the state for legislative purposes in a manner even as outrageous as the republican monstrosity of the present day, and besides a democrat would succeed Beveridge.—Columbia City Post.

New Thoughts in Education

Superintendent Potts of Huntington county, says 26 district schools in Huntington county have new teachers and are suffering thereby. The schools are suffering, Mr. Potts says, because the teachers are inexperienced. Mr. Potts does not mean to say that the young teachers employed in those 26 schools are not doing their best or that they are not fully qualified so far as knowledge of the branches taught are concerned, but experience is absolutely necessary before the best work can be performed by a teacher. So far as that goes experience is necessary in every profession and calling in life before the best work can be performed. It has always been so and always will be so so long as men sojourn for a few brief days on this earth and then pass away. What Mr. Potts is driving at, however, is this: He contends that school teachers are not sufficiently well paid to hold them in that profession. Young men and young women teach school until they can get something better. They are employed in the country schools but seven months out of the year. Part of the other five months must be spent in attending summer school in order that the young teachers may be up to date, and older teachers get work wherever they can. The pay, therefore, when the entire year is taken into consideration, is not large, and that is why there are not more men and women engaged in the business as a permanent avocation, and also explains why there are always a goodly number of new beginners every years. But the schools of the country districts and of the state have been making progress in spite of the young and inexperienced teachers, and it is doubtful if a substantial increase in the pay would eliminate the young teacher to any very great extent if it were tried. But these are the days of higher salaries all around, and why should not the school teacher come in for his increase along with the rest of the public servants.

They Injure Children

Ordinary Carthartics and Pills and Harsh Physic Cause Distressing Complaints

You cannot be over-careful in the selection of medicine for children. Only the very gentlest bowel medicine should ever be given, except in emergency cases. Ordinary pills, cathartics, and purgatives are apt to do more harm than good. They cause griping, nausea and other distressing after-effects that are frequently health-destroying and a life-lasting annoyance.

We personally recommend and guarantee Rexall Oderlies as the safest and most dependable remedy for constipation and associate bowel disorders. We have such absolute faith in the virtues of this remedy that we sell it on our guarantee of money back in every instance where it fails to give entire satisfaction, and we urge all in need of such medicine to try it at our risk.

Rexall Oderlies contain an entirely new ingredient which is odorless, tasteless and colorless. As an active agent, it embraces the valuable qualities of the best known intestinal regulator tonics.

Rexall Oderlies are eaten like candy. They are particularly prompt and agreeable in action, may be taken at any time, day or night; do not cause diarrhoea, nausea, griping, excessive looseness or other undesirable effects. They have a very natural action upon the glands and organs with which they come in contact, act as a positive and regulative tonic upon the relaxed muscular coat of the bowel and its dry mucous lining; remove irritation, overcome weakness, tone and strengthen the nerves and muscles, and restore the bowels and associate organs to more vigorous and healthy activity.

Rexall Oderlies completely relieve constipation, except when of a surgical character. They also tend to overcome the necessity of constantly taking laxatives to keep the bowels in normal condition.

There is really no medicine for this purpose so good as Rexall Oderlies, especially for children, aged and delicate persons. They are prepared in tablet form, in two sizes of packages; 12 tablets 10 cents, and 36 tablets 25 cents. Remember you can obtain Rexall Remedies in Butler only at our store—The Rexall Store. Geo. W. Geddes.

A CORROBORATION

Of Interest to Butler People

For months Butler citizens have seen in these columns enthusiastic praise of Doan's Kidney Pills, by residents of this locality.

Would these prominent people recommend a remedy that had not proven reliable?

Would they confirm their statements after years had elapsed if personal experience had not shown the remedy to be worthy of endorsement?

No stronger proof of merit can be had than cures that have stood the test of time.

The following statement should carry conviction to the mind of every Butler reader

Philip Oberlin, Route No. 1, Waterloo, Ind., says: "The principal symptom of kidney complaint in my case was a lameness across my back and sides. Whenever I caught cold, it settled in my kidneys and made my trouble worse. Finally I began taking Doan's Kidney Pills and they completely and permanently cured me. I have previously endorsed this remedy publicly and at this time I am glad to confirm my former statements."

For sale by all dealers. Price 50 cents. Foster-Milburn Co., Buffalo, New York, sole agents for the United States.

Better Not Get Dyspepsia

If you can help it. Kodol prevents Dyspepsia, by effectually helping Nature to Relieve Indigestion. But don't trifle with Indigestion.

A great many people who have trifled with indigestion, have been sorry for it—when nervous or chronic dyspepsia resulted, and they have not been able to cure it.

Use Kodol and prevent having Dyspepsia.

Everyone is subject to indigestion. Stomach derangement follows stomach abuse, just as naturally and just as surely as a sound and healthy stomach results upon the taking of Kodol.

When you experience sourness of stomach, belching of gas and nauseating fluid, bloated sensation, gnawing pain in the pit of the stomach, heart burn (so-called), diarrhoea, headaches, dullness or chronic tired feeling—you need Kodol. And then the quicker you take Kodol—the better. Eat what you want, let Kodol digest it.

Ordinary pepsin "dyspepsia tablets," physics, etc., are not likely to be of much benefit to you, in digestive ailments. Pepsin is only a partial digester—and physics are not digesters at all.

Kodol is a perfect digester. If you could see Kodol digesting every particle of food, of all kinds, in the glass test-tubes in our laboratories, you would know this just as well as we do.

Nature and Kodol will always cure a sick stomach—but in order to be cured, the stomach must rest. That is what Kodol does—rests the stomach, while the stomach gets well. Just as simple as A, B, C.

Our Guarantee

Go to your druggist today and get a dollar bottle. Then after you have used the entire contents of the bottle if you can honestly say, that it has not done you any good, return the bottle to the druggist and he will refund your money without question or delay. We will then pay the druggist for the bottle. Don't hesitate, all druggists know that our guarantee is good. This offer applies to the large bottle only and to but one in a family. The large bottle contains 2½ times as much as the fifty cent bottle.

Kodol is prepared at the laboratories of E. C. DeWitt & Co., Chicago.

We wish to call the attention of the public to the musical number of the lecture course to be given in the Thompson opera house Saturday evening. This entertainment will be something which all lovers of music should hear. Read some of the press notices elsewhere regarding the company.

We want to contract for the milk of 200 more cows, price $1.25 per cwt. for the year round the same number of cows in winter as summer. All summer cows $1 00 per hundred pounds. Parties bringing in their own cream receive this week 32 cents per pound for the butter fat. Those that are doing so are so well pleased that they are putting in more cows. 49-2

The entertainment by the Apollo Quintette and Bell Ringers proved a success. The whole program was rendered in excellent manner and the audience was highly entertained. The program was of such variety and quality that it was sure to please the most fastidious. It would be a difficult matter to state which numbers were the favorites. The bell ringing was certainly admirable, and the sweet music of the "Bells, Bells, Bells," was given a new meaning and a new understanding.—Princeton (Ind.) Clarion.

Men and Boys' Suits and Overcoats

When we say equal to tailor-made, we speak from our knowledge of the goods.

The makers of the Clothing we buy, employ skilled workmen and the garments they turn out are virtually tailor-made. The important part of the work is all done by hand, as you can readily see at a glance.

Shoes and Slippers

What more sensible gift could you make to man, woman or child, than a pair of shoes or slippers. We have a nice line to select from and know we can satisfy you in both price and style.

All Kinds of Shoes

For every member of the family from the fleeced lined shoes for Grandma to rubber shoes for the kids to play in the snow.

Underwear and Hosiery

When you buy these goods, you want to be sure that you are getting good value. It doesn't pay to buy some of the goods offered for sale. Our underwear and hosiery are the dependable grades and the best values obtainable.

Table Linens

One of the hobbies of most housewives is her Table Linens. In this we can suit the most practical as well as the most fastidious. We made a large purchase of Linens from a New York importer just before the new Tarriff Bill went into effect which increased the price on Imported Linens 10 to 20 per cent. We own them at the old price and will sell them accordingly. A beautiful line of patterns with napkins to match. Nothing nicer for Christmas gifts. Let us show them to you.

Men's Furnishings

There's class to our Men's Furnishings Department. Style is just as essential today in men's apparel as women's. Quality must also be there. We have succeeded in assembling for this season the greatest variety of shirts, underwear, half hose, neckwear, suspenders, handkerchiefs, etc., which for newness of style and merchandise value surpass greatly any of our previous efforts. You know what that means. In the lines specially designed for the laboring man, you will find brands that are a guarantee of fit, comfort and the best of service. We respectfully ask that you inspect our lines of those goods before purchasing.

Blankets and Comforts

Don't put off buying your winter supply of blankets and comforts another day. The cold nippy weather is here and we can't promise that present low prices will continue. Snug warm blankets that are filled with pure snow-white cotton are here now at very low prices.

Calling a man a liar won't always settle an argument.

If there's one thing worse than being poor, it's having poor relations.

Mr. Harriman's was a rare case. He was richer than generally supposed.

Alaska wants a legislature. And if she ever gets one she'll probably wish she hadn't.

A magazine writer is wasting his time in telling how to spoil a boy. Let Grandma do it.

When European monarchs meet they don't seem to take any stock in the kissing germ theory.

Anyway, the next minister designate to Pekin will know what not to do at the very outset.

The man who knows it all will tell it if he can get somebody to listen to him for five or ten minutes.

If the farms will only produce bigger crops, J. J. Hill will furnish the freight cars to haul them to market.

Wilbur Wright says the 60-miles-an-hour aeroplane is practically here. And there are no telephone poles ahead.

A 12-year-old Baltimore girl stole for the purpose of going to a moving picture show. Could depravity sink to a lower depth?

A man who has reached the age of 90 says a steady diet of pie did it. What a splendid tribute to the woman who made the pies!

A St. Louis man is advocating the shortening of the months. That might be all right if all the extra days could be added to October.

It now appears that the Harriman patriotism was more amply rewarded than we had supposed. The estate totals about $30,000,000.

A Connecticut mother spanked her daughter and the young man with whom she eloped. That is one way of spoiling a beautiful romance.

Not every boy can become a football hero, but there seems to be no reason why he should not wear his hair long during the season if he wants to.

And now Explorer Baldwin wants to reach the pole. So long as there is a choice apple which bears that name, why cannot the Baldwin family be satisfied without seeking further fame?

A Boston publisher of schoolbooks has decided to contribute $1,000,000 to the cause of peace. People who have complained because of the high prices they were compelled to pay for schoolbooks may be comforted by the thought that at least some of their money is to be well spent.

A Columbus, Ohio, lady has written a letter of complaint to the newspapers because she was compelled when she went to church last Sunday to sit beside a woman who had so thoroughly saturated herself with perfume as to be disgustingly odoriferous. It will never be possible to make church-going pleasant for some people.

An important suggestion, and one well worthy of consideration, was made by a formal resolution of the Grand Army of the Republic at its last national encampment. It was urged that one school under the jurisdiction of every local board of education in the country should be named the Lincoln School, in commemoration of the great President.

Service in the medical corps of the army does not appeal to young physicians, or they are not aware of the attractive pay offered and of the number of vacancies. At an examination recently, to test the qualifications of candidates for one hundred and four vacancies, only forty-two passed. The successful candidates begin with the rank of first lieutenant, at a cash salary of two thousand dollars a year, and with quarters, furniture, horse, fuel and other allowances, which make the pay equivalent to thirty-four hundred dollars. This increases with length of service and promotion; and after the retiring age the officer receives about two-thirds pay for the rest of his life.

It is now less than four years since the issue by a London publisher of the first volumes in a series of reprints of the works of standard authors, which marked an interesting experiment in providing the public with the world's best literature in handy and inexpensive form. The books were clearly printed and tastefully bound and sold for a shilling. On the recent addition of the four hundredth volume to the list the announcement was made that more than 5,000,000 separate copies had been disposed of. That is, fully five times the number of books in the Library of Congress, more than double the number of volumes in the Bibliotheque Nationale of Paris, the world's largest library—books all of a substantial character—have been absorbed within this brief time by a reading public whose intelligence is too often measured by the sales of "popular" fiction. The proof given that the world's great masters of literature are still the "best sellers," that works published in Athens and Rome before the Christian era or in Weimar or Florence centuries ago are to-day in lively demand, is an agreeable tribute to the quality and correctness of modern popular taste in literature.

Twenty years ago the cotton-boll weevil, having completely wiped out the cotton culture in many parts of Mexico, crossed the border and began its ravages in Texas. At about the same time fruit-growers in California awoke to the fact that a minute scale-like insect was threatening to destroy their apple, peach, pear and plum orchards. In spite of every effort, these two pests spread rapidly. Only the cotton-fields of the Atlantic coast have so far escaped the weevil's attack; the San Jose scale is domesticated in almost every State in the Union. Some persons predicted the complete destruction of both cotton-fields and orchards, and it is certain that a good many planters and fruit-growers were ruined. But the intelligence and ingenuity of man are proving equal to the emergency; and incidentally there are appearing certain of the blessings which always follow adversity courageously met. The Southern farmer has learned the benefits of a proper crop rotation, and a close and careful cultivation of his fields. In the boll-weevil country the old system of mortgaging the ungrown cotton crop to get the money with which to raise it has gone. There may not be any crop at all unless the planter is vigilant and industrious. There is more and harder work to be done, but there are the rewards of hard work to be had. Texas raises about as much cotton as ever, and more general crops. The banks show increased deposits. In one community the farm mortgages have fallen from twenty-eight hundred to four hundred. The orchardist has found that he can save his trees by thorough spraying. The scale is destroyed, and with it other pests, which were not dangerous enough to persuade the grower to the practice of spraying, but the destruction of which greatly improves the quantity and quality of the yield. The experience has been alarming and costly, but it has left both industries on a sounder basis, and has taught their practitioners much that will be of lasting value to them.

A New Antiseptic.—Vitralin, a new German pigment, is applied like ordinary paints with a basis of white lead or zinc white. Bacilli of tuberculosis are killed by the painted surface in three days, of diphtheria in five hours, and of typhoid in eight hours.

Cider for Typhoid.—A French chemist has recently proclaimed that cider is an antidote for typhoid fever. The malic acid in it is the agent as it destroys the germs. Cider in Europe is more generally used as a beverage than in this country. Germans appear to prefer cider after it becomes sour, but our people usually drink it while it is sweet.

Adenoids.—These are growths of various sizes which appear in the upper part of the throat. When large they may fill the back passage of the nose into the throat so that a child will breathe with the mouth open and snore at night. They may also close the openings of the little tubes which give rise to deafness or some other form of ear trouble. Children with adenoids have a vacant expression and are apt to be dull at school. The growths should be removed as soon as the symptoms become prominent.

Cough Remedy.—It is not the cough that we doctor so say the physicians but the disease that is the cause of the cough. The cough simply announces the fact that a certain member is diseased and the remedy should be applied accordingly. The following remedy for irritated lungs, which are so often manifested by a hacking cough, cannot be excelled. Two ounces of gum arabic soaked in a cup of cold water over night. In the morning set upon the stove until it comes to a boil, add the strained juice of four lemons and one pound of loaf sugar. Give a tablespoonful about once in two hours.

"Act Well Your Part."

But there is one great, striking difference between the theatrical stage and the great drama of human life. On the former, as a rule, the leading lights—the star actors and actresses—get most of the applause; those who are forced to play the lesser rules often get but scant notice. But on the great, wide stage where the Author of our being is both judge and audience, it matters not what part we play—whether it be prominent or obscure—provided we play it well. The hod carrier and the poor washwoman, who perform conscientiously and exactly the duties of their lowly state, may be far more pleasing to their Maker than the professional man, the monarch or the genius—certainly a consoling reflection.

Mathematically Impossible.

The farmer who spent half a day getting two fence posts in line with each other has a kindred spirit in the newly enlisted man who, not long ago, says the Argonaut, was ordered to the range for his first target drill. Out of his twenty-one chances, he made not a single hit.

"You've missed that target every time!" said an officer. "What on earth is the matter?"

"Well, sir," answered the new man, "the only reason I can think of is that the person who set up my target hasn't placed it in a straight line from here."

Where the Trouble Lay.

"You look sick, old sport. Is your trouble catching?"

"No it isn't," said the young recruit from the minor leagues. "My trouble is pitching."—St. Louis Star.

The roller skating fad, which became popular in England last winter, promises to continue this season as well.

THE GREATEST DANGER TO THE CHURCH TO-DAY

VIEWS OF CHICAGO CLERGYMEN ON THE MENACE TO ORGANIZED CHRISTIANITY

THAT a great danger menaces the churches to-day is acknowledged by all the prominent clergymen of Chicago, says the Inter Ocean. Some of them attribute it to general indifference and apathy on the part of the congregations and others to active opposition from avowed opponents of the church. Just how to counteract the principal danger is the problem which is confronting each individual clergyman. The views of those who are quoted are interesting from the standpoint of both clergymen and laymen who have thought upon these subjects. The Inter Ocean gives these expressions by prominent ministers:

BY THE REV. JAMES S. STONE,
St. James' Episcopal Church.

The greatest danger to the church to-day, in my opinion, is indifference. The fact that there is no active opposition to the church is to be deplored, because it is through opposition that interest is created. At the present time the church question is not being attacked to any extent. The greatest danger is shown by carelessness and irregularity in attending church. Sunday comes and goes and a large proportion of the members are not at the service. This indifference seems to affect chiefly the extremely well-to-do and the extremely poor. The principal concern of churchmen and ministers, I believe, should be given to the question of what this indifference will end in if it is kept up.

BY PROF. GEORGE B. FOSTER,
University of Chicago.

The greatest danger which menaces the church to-day is the danger of losing religion out of its life. The church establishes fixed doctrines which have legal validity for its members. The worth of a man's personal religion is measured by the degree of his assent to these dogmas. Compulsory religion is the logical outcome. It is this which is responsible, in part, for the fearful deterioration which has overtaken the religious life. Church and dogma become a tyrant's castle of the spirit without compare. Free thought and search for the truth are taboo. On this account there has arisen a broad, deep gulf between official religion and free science and search for truth. The church suffers to-day almost fatally from the well-nigh ineradicable distrust of free and veracious men toward religion and church. Then, again, there are the disciples of pure ethical culture. They think that they have a substitute for a bygone Christianity in their faith in an altruistic ideal. Finally, there is the religion of Socialism, Utopianism, sacrifice of the present to the perfection of later generations, and the altruism of class-consciousness—these amount to a substitute religion for Christianity. All these substitutes are angels of light to-day, and perhaps the greatest peril to the church to-day is their deceiving of her very elect.

BY THE REV. J. HENRY NAWN,
Corpus Christi Rectory.

When a Catholic priest speaks of danger to the church he does not wish to infer that the life, health or beauty of Christ's institution can ever be exposed to decay. Of the many dangers surrounding this militant church there is no one greater, in our humble opinion, than the presence in our universities and on the editorial staff of our popular newspapers of men whose position makes them teachers of others and whose principles, from the viewpoint of a Christian, are, to say the least, unmoral.

These are modern Sadducees to whom nothing is too sacred for them to twist and distort, disseminating the seeds of skepticism and making the worse appear the better reason to the immature and the shallow.

BY REV. JOHNSTON MYERS,
Immanuel Baptist Church.

The greatest enemy to the church is the subtle, secret foe within its membership. The man who pretends to believe in Christianity and at the same time does all within his power to destroy its influence is an enemy of the church. We have nothing to fear from the foes without. Our theological seminaries and universities contain the real enemies of the church. They quietly teach that which would destroy the church. They talk about the more liberal Christianity and greater freedom of thought. In reality they are trying to destroy confidence in the church. There must soon be a cleaning out of our seminaries and some measures must be taken by which the pulpits can be purged of men who make it their business to criticise the church.

BY REV. M. P. BOYNTON,
Lexington Avenue Baptist Church.

The greatest danger to the church to-day is a smug self-satisfaction and meager conception of the opportunities afforded by the local church organization. No institution of like importance and magnitude in the world is so poorly supported by its membership as is the Christian church. Not more than 50 per cent of the recorded membership is giving any support to the organized work. The rolls of the ordinary church are half dead timber.

As remedies for this state of things as we find them it is sometimes suggested that the different sects unite, that one church in a community is sufficient. This is a mere dream and will never be realized until the human mind is changed from what it is to-day. In all lines of life we line up in parties, and it is ever so in religious thinking and action.

What is supremely needed in the churches of to-day is individual sense of responsibility and individual activity in behalf of our common faith. Let the man of the street and the woman of the home preach the good news of God's love for man and His plan for red-blooded brotherhood everywhere. A clean life, an open hand and a square deal make up the best preaching one can do.

BY REV. ERNEST D. BURTON,
Professor of Semitic Languages, University of Chicago.

The only serious danger that confronts the church to-day is that it shall lose the clear vision of its mission and function in society. Its true purpose is to furnish to men, and to influence men to accept, true ideals of life. The church must do enough to make clear what the true principles of conduct are and to implant these in the hearts of men. To apply them practically is the task of men, but not of the church as such. The church has its own high task to perform. Its only danger is that it shall miss it through ambition to do what does not belong to it.

BY THE REV. B. A. GREENE,
Hyde Park Baptist Church.

The greatest danger to the church is the same in every generation—the danger of letting the religious life drop down to lower perfunctory levels, where it loses healthy glow and zeal.

That kind of profound religious life which walks with God and finds responsive chords in the spiritual teaching of the Bible will not be disturbed by the flippant flings of the skeptic or the trenchant criticism of the scientist. It will know the difference between religion and the expression of religion. It will easily see that religion is one thing and to philosophize about it is another thing.

SCALING THE WORLD'S LOFTIEST MOUNTAIN PEAKS

Mountain climbers are restlessly scouring the earth for virgin heights that yet remain to be scaled. It is feared that the best peaks have been conquered. Every climber wants to be first—the Columbus of a new summit. A professional alpinist turns up his nose at Mont Blanc and says there are no elevations worth mentioning in the United States. Europe, North and South America, Asia and Africa have been mostly done from the climbing standpoint. In the tropics and the polar regions the cloudy laurels have been snatched from the loftiest peaks.

The trouble with the Rockies in the United States from the professional standpoint is their accessibility. Some of them are scaled by railroads. However, there are some real peaks in the Canadian Rockies which foreign alpinists have condescended to visit with a suitable outfit and to vanquish. These mountains are no higher than Uncle Sam's cloud splitters, but their architecture is far more invitingly suicidal. Mr. Abbott, a member of the Appalachian Mountain Club, lost his life in 1905 while attempting to make the summit of Mount Lafroy (11,220 feet), one of the Selkirk peaks in Canada.

Within twenty-five years after the formation of the English Alpine Club in 1857, the best parts of the Alps were made quite stale and second hand. In 1868 three members of the club, Freshfield, Tucker and Moore, found a new field in the Caucasus, making the first ascent of Elbruz and of Kasbek. From the standpoint of the Caucasus, the new generation of alpinists looked back on the Alps as "a school for the art of climbing."

Yet there remain aiguilles or Alpine rock needles, thousands of feet high, which world climbers do not disdain to attack. Between the years 1884 and 1895 a host of Caucasian peaks, of which the chief was Dychtau were conquered by English, Hungarian and German professionals. In 1888 the Englishmen, Fox and Dunkin, perished mysteriously with their guide while attempting to scale the heights of Koshtantau. A member of the party, Dent, luckily stayed behind on the day of the fatal ascent. He returned the next year and found the last camp of his lost companions near the lofty summit. The double towered Causasian giant Ushba, with one peak in Europe and the other in Asia, was conquered on the Asiatic side in 1903 by A. Schulze at the imminent risk of his life.

In the great Himalayan field a record scarcely surpassed since is believed to have been made by the late W. H. Johnson, in 1865, when he went up 23,980 feet on E-61 of the Keun-Lun range. W. W. Graham reported to the Royal Geological Society that he had conquered Kabru (24,015 feet) in 1883, but since he failed to mention the usual attack of mountain sickness his report was discredited in some quarters. Nine years later Sir Martin Conway got to the top of Pioneer (23,000), in the Karakorum range. A famous English climber, A. F. Mummery, lost his life in 1895, while studying a feasible route to the top of Nanga Parbat (26,629), in Cashmere. Two natives disappeared with him.

The Americans, Dr. and Mrs. W. H. Workman, began their Himalayan career in 1898, and reached the summit of Koser Gunge (21,000). After exploring several glaciers they attained Mount Lungma (22,568) in 1903, and in 1906 made the first exploration of the Nun-Kun range, in which Mrs. Bullock-Workman made the virgin summit of Pinnacle Peak (23,300). Last year the Workmans were still on the trail of lofty heights. The year 1907 was distinguished by the ascent of Trisul (23,406) by Dr. T. G. Longstaff, in which he made the climbing speed record of six thousand feet in ten hours, and by the conquest of Kabru by two rank amateurs of the Norwegian race, C. W. Rubenson and Monrad-Aas. The guileless and untutored Norwegians not only made the world's record for height, but spent the night at a loftier elevation (22,600 feet) than human beings ever camped at before. They claim that they were not bothered much by the rarefied air. Their experience demonstrates the necessity of strict regulations on the part of professionals if climbing is not to degenerate into a cheap sport. The least that can be said of Messrs. Robinson and Monrad-Aas is that their style of grabbing the laurels of hoary-headed Kabru was indelicate.

In the Andes, Edward Whymper, who first mastered the Matterhorn in 1865, accomplished the conquest of Chimborazo (20,498) in the late 90's.

Among the few notable disasters in the annals of professional climbing, was that of Whymper's party in the first conquest of the Matterhorn, in 1865, and the accident on the Dent Blanche, in 1859. In the first case a novice slipped, and dragged with himself to death the chief guide and two others. The rope broke above the fourth man, saving Whymper and his two guides. In the Dent Blanche affair the chief guide slipped and pulled three others into a chasm. A solitary survivor was left "to make the perilous traverse over the summit, and to suffer a thousand deaths in the awful two days and nights that elapsed ere he dragged himself at length, exhausted and famished, to a place of safety."

TRAVERSE OF THE GREPON.

THIS DOG A FIGHTER.

As Louis A. Menegeaux, of Union Hill, N. J., was driving along he saw a little girl held at bay by a brindle bulldog. The terrified child crouched in the angle of a stoop, while the animal growled and snapped at her ankles, which she tried to protect with her short skirt.

Mr. Menegeaux lashed the dog with his whip. The dog turned from the girl and snarled at Mr. Menegeaux. The whip cut him across the mouth. The snap of the whip startled the horse, and as Mr. Menegeaux tried to quiet it the dog leaped into the buggy and bit the driver's leg several times. Then, when Mr. Menegeaux tried to beat him off, the dog seized his thumb. The ferocious animal was muzzled, but the strap was so loose that it did not hamper his jaws.

As Mr. Menegeaux was struggling with the horse, the dog was trying to reach Mr. Menegeaux's throat. A passerby seized an empty barrel standing on the sidewalk, and dropped it over the dog.

REVIEW OF TEN YEARS

Many Great Twentieth Century Achievements Hitherto Were Only Dreamed Of.

AVIATION AND EXPLORATION.

Completion of Pacific Cable and Many Engineering Enterprises —Visions Realized.

Through the achievements of Dr. Frederick A. Cook and Commander Robert A. Peary the years 1908 and 1909 have been made remarkable for all time.

So rapid was the development of the latter years of the nineteenth century in all departments of human endeavor, so wonderful the results, that upon the threshold of the twentieth century the traveler paused and queried: "Is there anything more to be done? Are there any more worlds to conquer? Is there any more glory to be gained? Must not wonderful achievements, those which are to become a part of the world's history because no accurate history can be written without them—must not such achiements become rare in the twentieth century?"

To such a pessimist the events of the last few weeks must have been a shock, says the New York Herald.

Across the English channel, from French soil to British, sped a man in the air, Bleriot, on a flying machine, a contrivance of wood and metal, heavier than air, with the speed of a bird—in the realm of birds.

Men's Dreams Are Fulfilled.

Men dreamed of such things in the nineteenth century. They dreamed of them when men first saw birds fly, but until the twentieth century came they never developed their thoughts and ideas into a practical reality that great nations must give up their gold if they are to stay in the race for supremacy.

And while the Wrights, those wonderful and successful aviators, and Curtiss and Bleriot and Farman and others have been developing the heavier than air flying machine, Count Zeppelin has been developing the dirigible baloon into a great air battle ship.

In the excitement produced by the achievements of Dr. Cook and Commander Peary the feats of the Mauretania have gained but slight recognition. Eastward and westward has this noble vessel crossed the Atlantic, each way, in less than five days, and so close to four days that she may well be called a four-day boat.

This has been the dream of steamship men and those who go down to the sea in ships ever since the ocean flyer was developed. It was the dream of the declining year of the old century. It is the actuality of the early years of the new. The Lusitania accomplished it a short time ago. It held the record just a week. The Mauretania surpassed it by seven minutes, making the run from Daunt's Rock, off Queenstown, to Ambrose Channel Lightship in 4 days 11 hours and 35 minutes.

Some Recent Accomplishments.

Turning to other fields of twentieth century achievement, it is to be recorded that on Feb. 25, 1901, J. Pierpont Morgan startled the financial world by the incorporation of the billion-dollar United States Steel Corporation, the greatest corporation in the world or in history.

In 1903 the Pacific cable was completed and on July 4 President Roosevent sent the first message over it to Gov. Taft of the Philippines, and the President also sent another message around the world by cable in twelve minutes.

March 11, 1904, an achievement of special interest to New York people was the completion of one of the tunnels under the Hudson.

In the latter part of May Admiral Togo won everlasting fame by destroying the Russian fleet and President Roosevelt was hailed as the great peacemaker when he intervened to end the war.

April 2—The Simplon tunnel, the longest tunnel in the world, was opened from the Swiss and Italian sides.

Rockefeller and Sage Gifts.

John D. Rockefeller achieved additional fame in the year 1907 by giving $32,000,000 to the general educational board.

March 12—Mrs. Russell Sage created the Sage Foundation with $10,000,000 for philantlropic work.

Judge Landis of Chicago sprang into fame with a hop-skip-and-a-jump on Aug. 3, when he fined the Standard Oil Company $29,240,000 in the United States District Court.

On Aug. 7 the Belmont tunnel was opened from 42d street to Long Island City.

The same year saw the American battleship fleet start on its voyage around the world, completing it on Feb. 22, 1909.

Jan. 9, 1908, the East River tunnel from the battery to Brooklyn was opened.

New York people have always before them in Madison Square a great achievement, the Metropolitan Life Insurance Building, the highest building in the world.

Commuters hail the opening of the Hudson River tunnel, which makes Jersey City but three minues away, as one of the greatest achievements of the twentieth century.

English agricultural societies have started a sparrow crusade. Bounties are paid for birds and eggs.

Spanish women have the smallest feet, but those of the United States are the best shod.

AMERICAN WIFE TO PAY ACCOUNTS OF BRAGANZA.

The American wife of Prince Miguel of Braganza is said to have sent agents to creditors of her titled husband, with instructions to settle claims like that which resulted in a suit for $1,200 against the prince. Impatience of the money lender who asked that amount is blamed for his failure to receive a settlement without legal action. As it is he will receive nothing.

The money lender is said to have grown overanxious when he heard of the prince's marriage to Miss Anita Stewart of New York at Tullochcastle, Dingwall, Scotland. He alleged that the prince, whose marriage was attended by a brilliant company of American plutocrats and Austrian aristocrats, borrowed $1,200 from him when he found himself unable to pay his hotel bill in Paris. Furthermore, the complainant averred, the eldest son of the pretender to Portugal's throne said he had not money enough to buy a railroad and steamship ticket to Scotland, where his future bride awaited him.

RAT BITES BOY IN BED.

Awakened from his sleep early in the morning by the screams of his 4-year-old son, David, who lay in an adjoining room, William Stauffer, of Philadelphia, was horrified to find the child engaged in an encounter with a monster rat, which had climbed upon the bed and bitten the boy several times. As the father struck a light he saw his son trying to fight the animal away from him. Each time he struck it, the rat would jump back again and bury its teeth in his flesh. First it bit him in the upper lip; this awakened the boy and he screamed. Then the rat took hold of his arm. By this time David could scarcely resist the attack, but with a fling he managed to throw the rat to the floor. Again the rat returned to the attack. The father killed it with one blow and ran with his son to the hospital, where the wounds were cauterized.

FRESH VEGETABLE TIPS.

If the lid is left off cabbage when cooking it will keep its color better.

When boiling fresh potatoes or peas try a sprig of mint in the water. It gives a delicious flavor.

A pinch of soda in the water in which green vegetables, peas, string beans and cabbage are boiled will keep the color.

Do not put salt in the water in which peas are cooked, as it causes the outer skin to crack. Leave lid off saucepan.

Cucumbers after soaking in cold salted water for an hour should be drained and shaken dry in a clean towel before using.

Soak cauliflower an hour before cooking. Put into boiling water to which a tablespoonful of salt is added. Boil from twenty to thirty minutes, according to size of the head.

To prepare cauliflower remove all the large green leaves and greater part of stalk. Soak in cold water to which has been added one teaspoonful of vinegar and a half teaspoonful of salt to each quart.

CHAPTER XV.

During several months of loneliness and sorrow a great change had been taking place in the mind of Pepeeta, of which she was only vaguely conscious. The strain which she had been undergoing began at last to exhaust her physically.

Her vital force became depleted, her step grew feeble, the light died out of her eyes, she drooped and crept feebly about her room. The determination which she had so resolutely maintained to live apart slowly ebbed away. She was, after all, a woman, not a disembodied spirit, and her woman's heart yearned unquenchably for the touch of her lover's hand, for the kisses of his lips, for the comfort of his presence.

This longing increased with every passing hour. Fatigue, weariness, loneliness, steadily undermined her still struggling resistance to those hungerings which never left her, till at last, when the failing resources of her nature were at their lowest point, all her remaining strength was concentrated into a single passionate desire to look once more upon the face which glowed forever before her inner eye, or at least to discover what had befallen in his sin and wretchedness.

It was a long and tedious journey from New Orleans to Cincinnati in those days, and it told terribly upon the weaked constitution of the wayfarer. Her heart beat too violently in her bosom; a fierce fever began to burn in her veins; she trembled with terror lest her strength fail her before she reached her journey's end. It was not of Death himself that she was afraid; but that he should overtake her before she had seen her lover!

Husbanding her strength as shipwrecked sailors save their bread and water, she counted the days and the miles to the journey's end, and having arrived at the wharf of the Queen City, the pale young traveler who had excited the compassion of the passengers, but who would neither comunicate the secret of her sorrow nor accept of any aid, took her little bundle in her thin hand and started off on the last stage of her weary pilgrimage. It was the hardest of all, for her money was exhausted and there was nothing for her to do but walk.

It was a cold December day. Gray clouds lowered, wintry winds began to moan, and she had proceeded but a little way when light flakes of snow began to fall. The chill penetrated her thin clothing and shook her fragile form. She moved more like a wraith than a living woman. Her tired feet left such slight impressions in the snow that the feathery flakes obliterated one almost before she had made another, and she was haunted by the thought that every trace of her passage through life was thus to disappear!

Ignorant of the distance or the exact direction, and stopping occasionally to inquire the way, she plodded on, the exhaustion of hunger and sweariness becoming more and more unendurable. All that she did now was done by the sheer force of will; but yield she would not. She would die cheerfully when she had attained her object, but not before. The winds became more wild and boisterous; they loosened and tossed her black hair about her wan face; they beat against her person and drove her back. Every step seemed the last one possible; but suddenly, just as she descended the slope of a steep hill, she saw the twinkling lights of the village and the feeble rays shot new courage into her heart. Under this accession of power she pushed forward and made her way toward the old Quaker homestead.

The night had now deepened around her; but every foot of the landscape had been indelibly impressed upon her memory, and even in the gathering gloom she chose the road unerringly. There were only a few steps more, and reeling toward the door yard fence she felt her way to the gate, opened it, staggered forward up the path in the rays of light that struggled out into the darkness, and with one final effort fell fainting upon the threshold.

The scene within the house presented a striking contrast to that without. In a great open fireplace the flames of the beech logs were wavering up the chimney. Seated in the radiance of their light, on a low stool, was a young boy with his elbows upon his knees and his cheeks in the palms of his hands. His mother sat by his side stroking his hair and gazing at him in fond, brooding love. The father was bending over a Bible lying open on the table, and had just articulated in slow and reverent tones the words of Jesus, "I was a stranger and ye took me in," when they heard a sound at the door.

Father, mother and son sprang to their feet and, hurrying towards the door, flung it open and beheld a woman's limp form lying on the threshold.

It was but a child's weight to the stalwart Quaker who picked it up in his great arms and carried it into the radiance of the great fireplace, and in an instant he and Dorothea his wife were pushing forward the work of restoration. The little boy stood gazing wonderingly at her from a distance. The calm features of the Quaker were agitated with emotion. His wife knelt by the side of the pale sleeper, and her tears dropped silently on the hand which she pressed to her lips.

For many days Pepeeta's life hung in the balance, her spirit hovering uncertainly along the border land of being, and it was only love that wooed it back to life.

When at length, through careful nursing, she really regained her consciousness and came up from those unfathomable abysses where she had been wandering, she opened her eyes upon the walls of a little chamber that looked out through an alcove into the living room of the Quaker house.

The silence was suddenly broken by a voice feeble and tremulous, but very musical and sweet. It was Pepeeta, who gazed around her in bewilderment and asked in vague alarm, "Where am I?"

Dorothea was by her side in an instant, and taking the thin fingers in her strong hands, replied: "Thee is among friends."

Pepeeta looked long into the calm face above her, and gathered reassurance; but her memory did not at once return.

"Have I ever been in this place before? Have I ever seen your face? Has something dreadful happened? Tell me," she entreated, gaving with agitation into the calm eyes that looked down into hers.

"I cannot tell thee whether thee has ever seen us before, but we have seen thee so much for a few days that we feel like old friends," said Dorothea, pressing the hand she held, and smiling.

Pepeeta's eyes wandered about the room restlessly for a moment, and then some dim remembrance of the past came back.

"Did I come here in a great storm?" she asked.

"Thee did, indeed. The night was wild and cold."

"Did I fall on the threshold?"

"Upon the very threshold, and let us thank God for that, because if thee had fallen at the gate or in the path we should never have heard thee."

Pepeeta struggled to a sitting posture as her memory clarified, fixed her wide open eyes upon Dorothea and asked, pathetically, "Where is he?"

"I do not know who thee means," said Dorothea, laying her hand on the invalid's shoulders and trying gently to push her back upon her pillow.

"David!" she exclaimed, "David Tell me if you know, for it seems to me I shall die if I do not hear."

"I do not know, my love. It is a long time since we have heard from David. But thee must lie down. Thee is not strong enough to talk."

"Are we alone?"

"Yes, all alone."

"Well, then I will begin," Pepeeta said, and in a voice choked with emotion, the poor sufferer breathed out the tale of her sin and her sorrow. She told all. She did not shield herself, and everywhere she could she softened the wrong done by David. It was a long story, and was interrupted only by the ticking of the great clock in the hall-way, telling off the moments with as little concern as when three years before it had listened to the story told to David by his mother. When the confession was ended the tender-hearted woman kissed the quivering lips.

"Have you forgiven me?" Pepeeta asked, seizing the face in her thin hands and looking almost despairingly into the great blue eyes.

"As I hope to be forgiven," Dorothea answered, kissing her again and again.

A look of almost perfect happiness diffused itself over the pale countenance.

"It is too much—too much. How can it be? It was such a great wrong!" she exclaimed.

"Yes, it was a great wrong. Thee has sinned much, but much shall be forgiven if thee is penitent, and I think thee is. No love nor pardon should be withheld from those who mourn their sins. Our God is love! And so we are ignorant and frail. It is a sad story, as thee says, but it is better to be led astray by our good passions that by our bad. I have noticed that it is sometimes by our holiest instincts that we are betrayed into our darkest sins! It was heaven's brightest light—the light of love—that led thee astray, my child, and even love may not be followed with closed eyes! But thee does not need to be preached to."

Astonished at such an almost divine insight and compassion, Pepeeta exclaimed, "How came you to know so much of the tragedy of human life, so much of the soul's weakness and guilt; you who have lived so quietly in this happy home?"

"By consulting my own heart, dear. We do not differ in ourselves so much as in our experiences and temptations. But thee has talked enough about thy troubles. Tell me thy name? What shall we call thee?"

"My name is Pepeeta."

"And mine is Dorothea."

"Oh! Dorothea," Pepeeta exclaimed, "do you think we shall ever see him again?"

"I cannot tell. We had made many inquiries and given up in despair. And now when we least expected news, thee has come! We will cherish hope again. We were discouraged too easily."

"Oh! how strong you are—how comforting. Yes, we will cherish hope, and when I am well I will start out, and search for him everywhere. I shall find him. My heart tells me so."

"But thee is not well enough, yet," Dorothea said, with a kind smile, "and until thee is, thee must be at rest in thy soul and, abiding here with us, await the revelation of the divine will."

"Oh, may I stay a little while? It is so quiet and restful here. I feel like a tired bird that has found a refuge from a storm. But what will your husband say, when he hears this story?"

"Thee need not be troubled about that. His door and heart are ever open to those who labor and are heavy laden. The Christ has found a faithful follower in him, Pepeeta. It was he who first divined thy story."

"Then you knew me?"

"We had conjectured."

"Then I will stay, oh, I will stay a little while, and perhaps, perhaps—who knows?" she clasped her hands, her soul looked out of her eyes, and a smile of genuine happiness lit up her sad face.

"Yes, who knows?" said Dorothea, gently, rearranging the pillows and bidding the invalid fall asleep again.

CHAPTER XVI.

In due time the vessel upon which David had embarked arrived at her destination, the city of New York, and the lonely traveler stepped forth unnoticed and unknown into the metropolis of the New World.

With an instinct common to all adventurers, he made his way to the Bowery. Amid its perpetual excitements and boundless opportunities for adventure, David resumed the habits formed during that period of life upon which the doors had now closed. His reputation had followed him, and the new scenes, the physical restoration during the long voyage, the necessity of maintaining his fame, all conspired to help him take a place in the front rank of the devotees of the gambling rooms.

He did his best to enter into this new life with enthusiasm, but it had no power to banish or even to allay his grief. He therefore spent most of his time in wandering about among the wonders of the swiftly-growing city, observing her busy streets, her crowded wharfs, her libraries, museums and parks. This moving panorama temporarily diverted his thoughts from that channel into which they ever returned, and which they were constantly wearing deeper and deeper, and so helped him to accomplish the one aim of his wretched life, which was to become even for a single moment unconscious of himself and of his misery.

Among the many acquaintances he had made in that realm of life to which his vices and his crimes had consigned him, a single person had awakened in his bosom emotions of interest and regard. There was in that circle of silent, terrible, remorseless parasites of society, a young man whose classical face, exquisite manners and varied accomplishments set him apart from all the others. He moved among them like a ghost—mysterious, uncommunicative and unapproachable.

From the time of their first meeting he had treated David in an exceptional manner. In unobserved ways he had done him little kindnesses, and proffered many delicate advances of friendship, and not many months passed before the two lone, suspicious and ostracized men united their fortunes in a sort of informal parthership and were living in common apartments.

There was in Foster Mantel a sort of sardonic humor into which he was always withdrawing himself. In one of their infrequent conversations the two companions had grown unusually confidential and found themselves drifting a little too near that most dangerous of all shoals in the lives of such men—the past.

(To be continued.)

LET THE WEAKLINGS DIE?

Theory of an English Socialist Seemingly Indorsed by Figures.

G. C. Hill, an English "sociologist," announces that it is mathematically a mistake to suppose that human life is lengthening. He thinks that in the British islands at least it can be proved mathematically that everything done to prevent sickly children from dying soon, cuts down the length of the "average lifetime" after 40. Writing in the Sociological Review he shows that in thirty years from 1870, the death rate among male infants under 5 years, was cut down from 75 to 58 in the thousand. The rate was cut down in one degree or another so that there were fewer deaths at all ages under 35. At 45 there was almost no change in thirty years. At from 45 to 55 he shows the British death rate going up from 19.6 to 20.8 in the thousand. Between 55 and 65 years it rose from 33.9 to 38.9.

His argument agrees with that of a considerable school of "sociologists," who agree with the sociology of the American Indians. By putting their babies in the cold water of the nearest stream, the Indians learned easily which were too weak to make a success in life as fighters and hunters. On the other hand, the biographies of men who have done most to civilize the world by great discoveries and inventions show that as children they were often so weak that they were kept alive only by the greatest and most loving pains.

Others who have minds as mathematical as that of Mr. Hill are now working out calculations showing that as the people of Europe get more to eat from the United States and South America they are growing taller and living longer for the same reason that natives of Missouri, Kansas and Texas measure half a foot taller than natives of Japan and China. Until a generation ago, sociologists of the highest Chinese education took the view taken now by Mr. Hill in England. They applied it chiefly against girl babies. It was a Chinese sociological custom to leave the undersized, superfluous girl exposed in the open air to starve to death.

PREPARING FOR THE SABBATH.

Influence on Children of Customs in Orthodox Jewish Households.

The Sabbath, including its complicated preparations, is rich and impressive material for a child's imagination, the American Hebrew says. On Thursday evening the mother already prepares dough, goes to market, cleans the fish, etc.

In the morning the baking of "chales" (bread). How bewitching for a child to watch the mother making different shapes of dough, smearing it with egg and decorating it with braids of different shapes and forms. A Jewish child gets the first lesson in what we call modelling by making make-believe "chales."

In the evening the mother prepares to meet the Sabbath. The child partakes in the household occupations and thereby gets habits of industry, order and regard for the rights and ideas of others and the fundamental habit of subordinating his activities to the general interest of the household.

This is especially true in regard to Jewish households where everything seems to be prescribed by law. Before darkness sets in on Friday the housewife lights in the dining room extra candles or a special lamp in honor of Sabbath and reads the blessing.

Quite often a child not yet able to talk will cover its face with its little palms, imitating the gestures of the devoted mother. The returning from the synagogue, the appreciative greeting, "Good-Sabbath," the Kiddush, the blessing over wine, the special menu and the holiday spirit of all who participate has undoubtedly a soothing, beneficent influence upon the child. After supper the time is spent in resting.

Unprejudiced.

Mike McGinnis was being examined for jury duty in a murder trial.

"Mr. McGinnis," asked the judge, "have you formed or expressed an opinion as to the guilt or innocence of the prisoner at the bar?"

"No, sir," replied Mike.

"Have you any conscientious scruples against capital punishment?"

"Not in this case, your honor," Mike replied.—Success.

MAID AND MATRON

What Have We Done To-Day?

We shall do so much in the years to come,
But what have we done to-day?
We shall give our gold in a princely sum,
But what did we give to-day?
We shall plant a hope in the place of fear,
We shall speak the words of love and cheer,
But what did we speak to-day?

We shall be so kind in the after while,
But what have we been to-day?
We shall bring to each lonely life a smile,
But what have we brought to-day?
We shall give to truth a grander birth,
And to steadfast faith a deeper worth,
We shall feed the hungering souls of earth;
Bunt whom have we fed to-day?

We shall reap such joys in the by-and-by,
But what have we sown to-day?
We shall build a mansion in the sky,
But what have we built to-day?
'Tis sweet in idle dreams to bask,
But here, and now, do we do our task?
Yes, this is the thing our souls must ask,
"What have we done to-day?"
—Nixon Waterman.

Wedding Gift Clubbing.

She who notes the names on cards attached to wedding gifts has marked an increasing tendency to club together in buying one striking present. The idea is becoming popular. Showering small gifts upon young couples is bound to result in many embarrassing duplications. One bride gazed with horror at no less than fourteen pie knives. Neither she nor her future husband ever indulged in pie. Clubbing avoids such duplications.

Hat for Tailored Gowns.

A smart little tailored hat of excellent design is sketched above. This is a pretty compromise between turban and hat, and shows the new lines without exaggeration. The hat was a blocked shape in the very becoming shade of gray called platina, whose name describes it perfectly. The low square crown was encircled by a band of velvet, in a darger shade of gray, the ends of which were joined at the left under a flat bow and fancy buckle, which held a touffe of coque feathers—the latter of pure white. Very appropriate would this be for wear with a tailored suit.

LATE FASHIONS ILLUSTRATED.

Bridge Gown in Russian Style.

Oddly shaped draperies and bold embroideries characterize the Russian costume effects, and most gowns along Russian lines have a charming grace and dignity. This bridge costume is of navy blue permo stuff—a crepe like mixture of worsted and mohair threads, which is light, soft and clinging. The drapery is in the form of a little pinafore, which slopes downward and is caught back of the ankles with a dull gilt clasp.

Theater Wrap With Scarf Sleeves.

Sleeves are a feature of the new evening wraps, which differ in this respect from the straight, sleeveless cape models of last season. This long wrap of rose-pink cloth has a yoke across the shoulders, from which the cloth falls in folds at the back, the scarf-like sleeves continuing this effect of fullness at the sides. The rose-colored cloth is embroidered with gold threads and gold cord and fringe add a sumptuous effect to the wrap.

Draperies Held With Buckles.

Many of the Paris frocks with drapery of soft material have huge pearl or metal buckles placed in such manner that they seem to hold up the soft folds. Sometimes the buckle is at the hip as in this case; often it holds a low sash drapery back of the knees. The frock is of sage green crepe with a braided garniture in self-color on the bodice, which is of green tucked chiffon over a cream lace yoke. The hat is of Gage turban model of green moire and velvet.

Caring for Table Linen.

The careful keeping of table linen will mean more toward a perfect table than perhaps the quality of the linen itself. The most exquisite table linen will look no better than the poorest quality if it be thrown into a small drawer or closet.

Just a pair of tablecloths will go further if they are kept well flattened or, better, still, rolled on a pasteboard or wooden roller, than a dozen ill-kept ones.

All centerpieces, if not rolled, should be spread flat, in a full-sized box or a linen-covered portifolio. The portfolio is a reliable addition to the dining room or pantry, and it may be made at home by covering two pieces of pasteboard with tan colored linen or crash, hinging them together with coarse linen thread or with narrow ribbon strips an inch in length, so that the portfolio will hold more flat linen pieces. This, when filled, is tied together with ribbons and kept in a napkin drawer, where even the sudden rush for napkins can no longer wrinkle the embroidered linens.

Babies often vomit their milk and if the mother is young and inexperienced she is apt to be worried by this. A baby's stomach is small and will only hold a small amount of food and when more milk is swallowed than the stomach can hold there is bound to be an overflow which is the baby's salvation. When the baby cries from difficult or imperfect digestion more food is poured into the stomach already in a state of rebellion. At first the warm milk will seem to ease the pain, but later on it will aggravate the trouble that it was expected to relieve. Relief is often obtained by applying wet warm compresses to the abdomen.

For the Complexion.

The "chamois treatment" is the latest thing for the complexion, and is said to produce that pearl-like pallor, which is modish just now. The skin is massaged gently with a cleansing skin food. Then, while moist, it is rubbed with a strip of the chamois, which has been wet with warm water, covered with the lather of some pure kind of soap, and then allowed to dry. When dry it is soft and fine and very good for the skin, says a beauty specialist.

Strength of Human Hair.

A human hair of average thickness can support a load of 6¼ ounces, and the average number of hairs on the head is about 30,000. A woman's long hair has a total tensile strength of more than five tons, and this strength can be increased one-third by twisting the hair. The ancients made practical use of the strength of human hair. The cords of the Roman catapults were made of the hair of slaves.

Stocking Economy.

Children's stockings may be made to do double duty by watching for thin places and not allowing them to quite wear through. When the knee is nearly broken cut off the foot (which is apt to be badly worn) and sew on one of the excellent feet that may be bought ready for use, putting the back of the stocking in front so as to distribute the knee wear; of course, this is possible only with straight stockings.

Health and Beauty Hints.

For night sweats drink cold sage tea instead of drinking water.

A small bag of salt, well heated and covered with flannel, gives relief when applied to an aching ear.

For cramps get a cheap white silk handkerchief, cut in two, hem the raw edges and tie around each leg when you go to bed at night.

For sore throat get 5 cents' worth of chlorate potash powdered; dissolve one teaspoonful in a glass of water and gargle the throat several times a day and it will be relieved in a short time.

For a disordered stomach sip a half pint of water taken just as hot as possible a half hour before each meal and just before retiring.

A good many times one blames sore toes on the shoes worn, when it isn't the shoes at all, but a big hummock in the stocking where it has been mended.

It is stated by an enthusiast of fencing as a sport for women that there is no exercise which so well develops the figure. It invariably gives grace to movement.

For callouses go to some harness shop and get enough sheepskin to make soles for your shoes. Get the shortest wool and wear them all the time in your shoes wool side up.

To whiten the teeth use powdered pumice stone. Dip a toothpick in the powder and dig off all the deposits, but this must not be used oftener than once in four weeks, for it injures the enamel.

For those who are troubled with insomnia or are given to bad dreams nothing equals the habit of reading in bed—provided one's book is suitably chosen and the reading is done hygienically.

Glossy hair generally indicates that it has been well and carefully kept—that is, shampooed every few weeks, thoroughly brushed with the usual fifty strokes every day and the scalp massaged regularly.

Use for Empty Spools.

All empty spools are saved in our household, from the largest ribbon one to the tiniest buttonhole twist. Whenever any dyeing is done, the accumulated spools are dropped into the solution. Then they are put away, to be brought out only in stormy weather. Supplemented by meat skewers, their building possibilities are almost unlimited, and their gay colors have the cheering effect needed by children on a rainy day.

Fads and Fancies in Dress

Long sashes are being worn with coat suits.

Fur neckpieces are very wide and muffs are huge.

Some of the dainty new silk stockings have lace insteps.

Red is a brilliant exception to the rule that makes for dull-hued colors.

For coats with the extra deep opening either one or three buttons is the proper number.

The use of panne is a millinery feature, especially for the purpose of fashioning turbans.

Superb embroidery trimming schemes in color show touches of jet introduced into the designs.

Corded silks of the ottoman type are in great demand for evening wraps, and the moire velours have never been so effective.

Even in children's clothes the ever-present note of black is found, either as piping, revers or trimming or some slight kind.

Travel hats are already here and are of the lightest possible make of felt. Some of them are turned up at one side—the so-called "left-side tilt."

An odd but strangely becoming chiffon sleeve found in more than one stunning evening gown is made perfectly plain, without tuck or gather, and with no finish at the bottom.

Eye Discomfort.

A French oculist has given some special attention to the study of eye discomfort, which is experienced by some persons after watching a moving picture exhibition, and he has given the malady the name of cinematopthalmia. He has found that some eyes are not affected in the least and that others recover quickly. In some cases the trouble is avoided by giving the eyes a rest for a few seconds immediately after the first shock, which takes place as soon as the display has commenced.

THE HOUSEHOLD

Vanilla Nut Caramels.

Wet a pound of granulated sugar with a little milk or water and put into a porcelain-lined saucepan. When the sugar is dissolved stir in a lump of cream of tartar as large as a big pea, dissolving it first in a tablespoonful of water. Boil until the candy is hard when a little is put into iced water; add a teaspoonful of vanilla, a tablespoonful of butter and a cup of minced nut meats. Turn into shallow greased pans, mark off into squares and set aside to cool.

Honey Muffins.

Sift two cupfuls of flour with two level teaspoonfuls of baking powder and a quarter of a teaspoonful of salt. Rub in two level teaspoonfuls of sweet butter, two eggs well beaten, five tablespoonfuls of milk and two-thirds of a cup of honey. Mix and pour into well-greased round muffin tins, filled half full; bake in a moderate oven. These muffins may be covered with fruit pudding sauce or whipped cream and served for cottage puddings.

Chicken a la Royal.

Heat one large cupful of milk, thicken with one tablespoon of flour rubbed smooth in one of butter, season with a saltspoonful of salt and a dash of pepper. Add to the sauce six mushrooms, cut fine, one-fourth of a cupful of minced ham, two cupfuls of cold boiled or roast chicken, one tablespoonful of minced parsley and one green pepper minced fine. Heat in the sauce five minutes, then serve on squares of buttered toast.

Cream Scones.

Sift one and one-half cupfuls flour into a basin, add one teaspoonful of sugar and one teaspoonful of baking powder. Rub in one heaping tablespoon butter, then make into soft paste with some cream. Divide it in two pieces. Take one piece and roll it out quite thin and round, then roll out the second piece and cut into eight pieces. Lay them on hot griddle and bake them for five minutes, turning them once.

Tomato Relish.

Peel, chop and drain a peck of half-ripe tomatoes. Add 2 cups of chopped celery, 6 onions and 6 mango peppers, chopped fine (remove the seeds from the peppers before chopping them), 1 pound of brown sugar, 2 quarts of vinegar, 1 cup of salt, 2 ounces of mustard seed and a little nutmeg. Mix thoroughly, and store in jars. This relish will keep indefinitely without cooking or heating.

Frosty Chocolate.

Make the chocolate as usual for drinking, using at least three heaping teaspoonsful of grated chocolate to each pint of boiling water or milk. Cook in a double boiler and set aside to cool. When cold add one cupful of cream. Beat all well together and serve in tall glasses with either cold whipped cream or whites of eggs (stiff beaten and sweetened) on top of the chocolate.

Syllabub.

Peel and slice very thin two sweet oranges and two ripe bananas into a cold dish, and sprinkle over them one-fourth of a cupful of sugar. Whip one cupful of cream, add to it a little at a time one-half cupful of sugar. Beat the whites of two eggs very stiff, then whip these lightly into the cream and heap it over the fruit. Set on ice until ready to serve.

French Creole Drink.

Take one pineapple, one lemon and a quart of milk. Crush the pineapple, press the lemon, strain the juice of both in a fine sieve or through a piece of linen; add a quart of milk, a piece of ice and sugar to taste. The creoles serve this in large jugs, with a double bottom containing a piece of ice to keep it cool instead of mixing the ice with the beverage.

Soup from Canned Salmon.

Take half a can of salmon, remove all skin and bones and chop it fine. Boil an onion in one quart of water for about fifteen minutes; take out the onion, thicken the milk with one scant tablespoonful of butter and two tablespoonfuls of flour, a teaspoonful of salt and pepper to taste. Add the salmon; boil up and serve.

Pea Soup.

Cut one pound each of beef and salt pork into inch pieces. Boil one quart of peas until tender and press through a sieve. Add this pulp to the meat, cover with four quarts of water and boil until the quantity has been reduced to two quarts. Season with celery or sweet herbs, salt and pepper and serve.

Cream of Rice.

One-half cup of rice, four tablespoons of sugar, one-quarter teaspoon salt. Pour over this one pint of hot water and one pint milk. Scald and remove half the liquid. Bake till nearly done. Stir in remaining liquid and bake a minute or so more. Take from oven while still quite wet, as it dries up when cool.

Italian Tomato Sauce.

Take twelve tomatoes and six good-sized onions and slice together in a stewpan. Add a little thyme, a bay leaf, a tablespoonful of butter, salt, half a dozen allspice, a little Indian saffron and a teacupful of beef tea. Cook an hour over a moderate fire, strain it, heat again and put aside for use.

Cream Icing.

Stir together one and a half cups of granulated sugar, ten tablespoonfuls of milk, one tablespoonful of butter and a pinch of salt. Cook until the mixture threads, then beat hard and put upon cake or on freshly baked buns.

Cream one-half a cup of butter and one cup of sugar with one tablespoon boiling water. Beat with an egg beater until foamy.

TRADE MARK
THE STANDARD REMEDY FOR ALL FORMS OF RHEUMATISM
LUMBAGO, SCIATICA, NEURALGIA, KIDNEY TROUBLES, CATARRH, ASTHMA and KINDRED DISEASES
GIVES QUICK RELIEF
Applied externally it affords almost instant relief from pain, while permanent results are being effected by taking it internally, purifying the blood, dissolving the poisonous substance and removing it from the system.
DR. C. L. GATES
Hancock, Minn., writes:
"A little girl here had such a weak back caused by Rheumatism and Kidney Trouble that she could not stand on her feet. The moment they put her down on the floor she would scream with pains. I treated her with "5-DROPS" and today she runs around as well and happy as can be. I prescribe "5-DROPS" for my patients and use it in my practice."
TEST "5-DROPS" FREE
If you are suffering with Rheumatism, Lumbago, Sciatica, Neuralgia, Kidney Trouble or any kindred disease, write to us for a trial bottle of "5-DROPS." "5-DROPS" is entirely free from opium, cocaine, morphine, alcohol, laudanum and other similar ingredients.
Large Size Bottle "5-DROPS" (200 Doses) $1.00. For Sale by Druggists.

The strange wild animal in the Schuman swamp northwest of the city, described as a big brown beast, has caused intense excitement among the hunters of the city and they are organizing to beat the bushes for the brute's hide. Herb Mosher is organizing one party and Capt. Markley of Company G. with a number of his trusty riflemen, will make an assault on the jungles. If some of them come down the road all out of breath they will not be so apt to make sarcastic remarks concerning the veracity of parties who claim they saw the beast. —Post.

The sink hole on the Lake Shore railroad at Mina, a few miles west of Bryan, went down faster last week than at any time before. The ground settled faster than the hole could be filled up, the gravel sinking below the level of the tracks. This unusual condition of the road bed near Mina is proving an expensive problem for the railroad company. The hole has already gone down over thirty feet and over 200 carloads of gravel have been put in. Fifty men were at work all day a week ago Sunday, when the con tinuous rains made it almost impossible to keep the tracks up to a level. One track sinks for a distance of 1200 feet, another 800 feet and the third track 300 feet.

Benjamin L. Boyer, a Whitley county farmer, who lives in a township where the schools have been consolidated, insisted that the trustee must drive up to his door, get his children and take them to school. Boyer lived a half mile from the main route of the wagon and the trustee insisted that children must walk to the corner and be picked up. A lawyer who doubtless saw a fee, told Boyer to sue the trustee, which he did and last Saturday Judge Wrigley upheld the trustee. That is according to a recent decision of the supreme court.—Ligonier Ban-

Women Who Are Envied

Those attractive women who are lovely in face, form and temper are the envy of many, who might be like them. A weak, sickly woman will be nervous and irritable. Constipation or Kidney poisons show in pimples, blotches, skin eruptions and a wretched complexion. For all such, Electric Bitters work wonders. They regulate Stomach, Liver and Kidneys, purify the blood; give strong nerves, bright eyes, pure breath, smooth, velvety skin, lovely complexion. Many charming women owe their health and beauty to them. 50c at Stone's drug store 48-1m

FREE TO YOU—MY SISTER

Free to You and Every Sister Suffering From Woman's Ailments.

I am a woman.
I know woman's sufferings.
I have found the cure.

I will mail, free of any charge, my home treatment with full instructions to any sufferer from women's ailments. I want to tell all women about this cure—you, my reader, for yourself, your daughter, your mother, or your sister. I want to tell you how to cure yourselves at home without the help of a doctor. Men cannot understand women's sufferings. What we women know from experience, we know better than any doctor. I know that my home treatment is a safe and sure cure for Leucorrhoea or Whitish discharges, Ulceration, Displacement or Falling of the Womb, Profuse, Scanty or Painful Periods, Uterine or Ovarian Tumors or Growths; also pains in the head, back and bowels, bearing down feelings, nervousness, creeping feeling up the spine, melancholy, desire to cry, hot flashes, weariness, kidney and bladder troubles where caused by weaknesses peculiar to our sex.

I want to send you a complete ten days' treatment entirely free to prove to you that you can cure yourself at home, easily, quickly and surely. Remember, that it will cost you nothing to give the treatment a complete trial; and if you should wish to continue, it will cost you only about 12 cents a week, or less than two cents a day. It will not interfere with your work or occupation. Just send me your name and address, tell me how you suffer if you wish, and I will send you the treatment for your case, entirely free, in plain wrapper, by return mail. I will also send you free of cost, my book—"WOMAN'S OWN MEDICAL ADVISER"—with explanatory illustrations showing why women suffer, and how they can easily cure themselves at home. Every woman should have it, and learn to think for herself. Then when the doctor says—"You must have an operation," you can decide for yourself. Thousands of women have cured themselves with my home remedy. It cures all, old or young. To Mothers of Daughters, I will explain a simple home treatment which speedily and effectually cures Leucorrhoea, Green Sickness and Painful or Irregular Menstruation in Young Ladies. Plumpness and health always result from its use.

Wherever you live, I can refer you to ladies of your own locality who know and will gladly tell any sufferer that this Home Treatment really cures all women's diseases, and makes women well, strong, plump and robust. Just send me your address, and the free ten days' treatment is yours, also the book. Write today, as you may not see this offer again. Address

What is Your Aim in Buying Goods?

Is not true that every person that buys any kind of merchandise expects value received for his money.

Cheap shoes as a rule do poor service. It goes without saying, "He profits most who buys good goods."

We do not claim that our shoes are any cheaper than some other good shoes for low price is the running mate of low quality.

What we claim and can prove is that our shoes have created a money making habit for our customers because of the service they give.

A customer well served will bring a friend with him next time. This is where our shoes count faster to you than compound interest.

Do You Know The Value of Good Shoes?

Twenty-two Trains Daily

Traveling men should locate in Butler. It is the most centrally located city along the great "Air Line" railroad, which by the way will soon have four tracks from New York to Chicago. Besides this great enterprising railroad we have the main line of the Wabysh running from Detroit to St. Louis, and the Vandalia terminal. Passenger trains leave Butler at all hours of the day, making it exceedingly convenient for the traveling public to get in and out of our city. Thus it will be seen at a glance that this city is a desirous place for the "runner" to locate with his family. Besides these railroad advantages are numerous other inducements such as a genial people, fine schools and churches, good water, and best of all is the bright sunshine and pure air, which the larger places do not possess.

For the convenience of the traveling public below is given the trains and ime of leaving:

Lake Shore, East beund—1:35 a. m. 1:42 a. m., 2:34 a. m., 8:35 a. m., 12:10 p. m., 1:14 p. m., 5: 53 p. m. West bound—1:32 a. m., 3:03 a. m , 7:09 a. m., 9:29 a. m., 4:10 p m.

Wabash, East bound—5:12 p. m , 9:03 a. m., 6:48 a. m. West bound—8:17 p. m., 10:19 a. m., 4:29 a. m. Vandalia, Going Out—7:15 a. m., 3:45 p. m. Coming In, 10:15 a. m., 8:05 p. m

Besides these passenger trains are the local freights, which carry passengers.

M. E. Notes

On Sunday, Dec. 19 and also Dec. 26, special Christmas music will be rendered by a large choir both morning and evening. A Christmas sermon will be delivered each Sunday. The Epworth League and Sunday School will celebrate the Christmas tide with special services. The minister and congregation will welcome all who may come.

The L. A. S. of the M. E. church will meet next Friday afternoon with Mrs. William Knisely. All members and friends are invited and urged to be present.

The Methodist Brotherhood will celebrate their first anniversary by attending a banquet, Jan. 17, 1910. Each member of the organization will be permitted to bring one guest. A fine banquet is promised and the toasts and songs will be of unusual interest.

Rev. E. F. Albertson has written an article entitled "Through Nature to God." This was published in the Epworth Herald of Nov. 27. This periodical is one of the leading young people's papers. It is published at Chicago and has a circulation of about one hundred thousand. Rev. Albertson is a frequent contributor to some of the religious periodicals.

EDMUND E. ALBERTSON, Minister

Church of Christ Items

The regular monthly business meeting of the Y. P. S. C. E. will be held on Friday evening of this week in the church basement. A full attendance of the membership is expected as there will be election of officers and other important business to be transacted.

The committees are busy at work on the Christmas entertainment.

Rev. J. H. Crouse of the Lutheran church gave a very inspiring and helpful talk to our young people last Sunday evening.

Services of Lord's day at the usual hours. Theme of morning sermon—"What Catholics Can Learn From Protestants." Evening—"The Dominant Force in Character and Civilization."

Arthur Haley is expected home this week from the evangelistic field. We feel safe in making the announcement that he will favor us with special music at the Sunday services.

The spirit of selfishness is at the root of practically all the ills of our civilization. It has and still does infest society in multifarious ways. All sorts and conditions of humanity are in subjection to its insidious power. The purpose of Christ and the mission of His Church is to remove and neutralize this spirit of self-interest and thus ring the death knell of the major part of humanities woes.

S. B. BRADEN, Minister.

The Big Farm Sale

Of Frank B. VanAuken, near Pleasant Lake, will be Monday, Dec. 20th. $2,000 worth of property must be sold. The splendid Dictum junior, and other standard horses and thoroughbred cattle, farm implements, corn, hay, furniture, etc. will be closed out. 50-1

CLARK SNYDER CRUSHED TO DEATH

Butler Young Man Met Horrible Death in Bryan Show Case Factory

Clark Snyder, youngest son of Mr. and Mrs. Amos Snyder, of West Oak street, without a moment's warning, was caught in a belt at the Bryan, Ohio, show case works, Tuesday morning, and before he could be extricated from the perilous position, both arms were torn from his body and his head completely crushed to a pulp.

The young man had gone to the factory, where he had been employed for a few years, and shortly after the hour of seven he was engaged in work about a large pulley. In some inconceivable manner his arm was caught in the belt of a fly wheel and the member was torn from the body. His legs became entangled in the wheel and the bones of each were broken in several places. A physician was at once summoned and found that death was instantaneous.

John Weber, owner of the plant, was in the motor room at the time of the accident and heard Snyder's body strike the ceiling. Thinking a belt had broken, he threw open the clutch just as Otis Jesse, who was working with Snyder, reached the place to stop the machinery.

The sad news was conveyed to his wife and also his parents who could scarcely believe the young man had met such a fate. Mr. and Mrs. Amos Snyder took the first train to Bryan and returned with the remains Wednesday morning.

Those who are acquainted with Mr. Weber, owner of the plant, held him in high esteem and it is quite likely he will aid the bereaved wife in a financial way, though we have been informed that it was not the fault of the company that the accident occurred.

The deceased was until a few years ago a resident of this place, and up to the time of his marriage and subsequent to the time of entering the employ of the Show Case Co., had been away from his parents and home but very few times.

He was married to Miss Maud Thurston something like three years ago, taking up his residence in Bryan. Besides a grief stricken wife and young babe, he leaves his parents and many other relatives and friends to mourn his untimely death. It is a very sad circumstance, grievous in the extreme, because of the young wife who is left practically alone to battle the ways of the world and provide for herself and babe.

The funeral was held Thursday from the M. E. church conducted by Rev. Dallas Hollinger, of Bryan. Interment in Butler cemetery.

Another Factory Prospect.

Fred Countryman went to Jackson, Mich., last Friday to investigate a factory proposition which has been offered this city. While we are not permitted at this time to state the particulars, yet we can assure our citizens that Mr. Countryman considers it a very promising business and worth going after. In fact since his investigation and report of same most of the financial backing has been pledged. The Jackson parties are expected to be in Butler, Saturday, at which time it is hoped an understanding will be reached between the citizens and the parties holding patterns and patents for the machine which will be manufactured.

POWER PROBLEM HAS BEEN SOLVED

New Gas Engine Factory to Be Run With Electricity

The Trebert Gas Engine factory which made a proposition to remove from Rochester, N. Y., to this city, has removed to Butler. The plant has arrived there but the question of power is causing a mixup The plant was formerly operated with electric current on direct motors on each machine. An attempt was made to secure a day current at Butler for the plant, but it fell through, just as the proposition has "vamoosed" in Columbia City. A city with not enough enterprise to furnish a day current doesn't deserve factories and seldom gets them. Then if by chance they do land one, it usually pulls stakes in a year or two. —Columbia City Commercial.

Right you are, Bro. editor of the Commercial regarding the enterprise of a city. But the power proposition for Butler's new factory has been solved. The machinery which will be put to going within a few days will be run with a dynamo which was purchased last week by F. Swantusch and is now on the road here.

It looks now as though nothing could stop the new factory. They are receiving orders almost every day and the superintendent, Mr. J. George Wagner, is pushing the work of installing the machinery as rapidly as possible. He thinks with their present capacity that they will be able to put out about six engines per day. Mr. Wagner purchasing one of the best residence properties in our city is evidence of his confidence in the business. William Elden and Frank Brown have charge of installing the machinery.

K. of P. Banquet.

The K. of P. banquet was given Tuesday night at the close of work as was announced that it would be in the HERALD last week, and the large attendance is evidence of the value of the HERALD as an advertising medium. First and third rank work was conferred on three candidates, after which the banquet took place. Besides a large attendance of our local members several of the boys from the surrounding country and four or five traveling men who were in the city took advantage of the opportunity and were present for both the work and the feast. At the close of the work the visitors were given the privilege of making a few remarks. It was at this time that one of the gentlemen handed the brethren a nice compliment by saying that he had visited a great many lodges in this state, but that outside of our metropolis city of Indianapolis Butler had them all beat for nice quarters and good work. That compliment was certainly worth all they got to eat. There is much interest being manifested in this order at present and some very good members are being taken in. Attend and help keep up the interest.

Rev. L. O. Oyler Passes Away

Rev. L. O. Oyler, presiding elder of the Fort Wayne District St. Joseph conference, passed away at his home in Huntington on Wednesday, December 15. The funeral services will be held at the U. B. church in North Manchester, Saturday, December 18, by Rev. G. F. Byrer.

The deceased is well known among the U. B. people here. He was to have held services here one week from next Sunday.

Rev. Parker of this place expects to attend the funeral.

We clip the following paragraph from his home paper:

From the time Rev. Oyler came to this city, something over a year ago, as the successor of Rev. Hammond, he made friends readily and once made he always continued to hold them. Recently he was elected presiding elder of the Fort Wayne district, a new circuit which was created on account of the growth of the church and he entered upon his new duties with his usual activities but his health was failing without his being aware of it. Finally he was compelled to take to his bed with what was then thought to be a nervous breakdown.

ALLEN GERNER ACCIDENTALLY SHOT

While Hunting on John Walker's Farm South of Waterloo Saturday Morning

Allen Gerner, aged 16, son of Carl Gerner, former editor and publisher of the Waterloo Dawn, was shot and instantly killed by the accidental discharge of a shot gun in his own hands, as he was climbing over a fence on the John Walker farm, south of Waterloo, at 8:30 o'clock Saturday morning, the charge entering his chest to the right of his heart and tearing a jagged hole.

In company with his brother, Carl Gerner, age 21, the youth left home early Saturday morning on a day's hunting expedition. As they crossed a field on the Walker farm, Allen cocked his gun to be ready for a shot, should the game appear, and did not let down the hammer as he started to clambor over the fence. Carl heard the shot and his brother's cry, which came almost simultaneously, and, turning he saw his brother fall to the ground dead.

Hurrying to the nearest farm house, Carl summoned help and telephoned to Dr. E. K. Shultz, of Waterloo. With the arrival of the doctor, the body, then cold in death, was picked up and carried to a conveyance and was taken to the Ettinger undertaking establishment at Waterloo to be prepared for burial before being taken to the home of the almost prostrated parents.

The dead boy was the youngest of three sons of Mr. and Mrs. Gerner. Hubert died two years ago from consumption and the only surviving one is Carl.

FREMONT DRUGGIST GETS $75 and COSTS

ANGOLA, Ind., Dec. 15.—Judge Luke R. Wrigley, of Albion, Ind., was called here last week to preside as special judge in the case of the State vs. Robert Cameron, charged with selling intoxicating liquor to a person in the habit of becoming intoxicated, without a doctor's prescription. The defendant is a druggist doing business at Fremont, this county, and has at different times figured in the courts here as defendant in cases brought on similar charges. Sometimes he has been acquitted, but on several previous occasions has paid the penalty of the law, in one instance, at least, serving a sixty day term in the county jail, in addition to paying a fine. In the present case the hearing of the evidence and arguments of council occupied the time of court all day Monday. Tuesday at nine o'clock, a. m., the court instructed the jury, which took the case at about ten o'clock and at noon returned its verdict, finding the defendant guilty as charged. The penalty was fixed at seventy-five dollars and costs. There is talk that the case will be appealed to the supreme court. This is the first case tried in the court here under the new liquor law. Another indictment is pending against Cameron, but this has been continued to the next February term.

A setting hen may be a loafer, but she gets results.

We can usually struggle along without most of the things we want.

Truth is stranger than fiction—that is to say, more of a stranger.

Well, there's one comfort—nobody is asking, "Is it hot enough for you?"

The ultimate consumer has at last been located. He is the dog that ate Cook's shoes.

If language was given to us to clothe our thoughts, it's too bad there are so many misfits.

One of the things a man can't understand is why his enemies seem to have so many friends.

Until the earth gets softer aeroplaning is hardly likely to become as safe a sport as croquet.

Every man, of course, is of some importance in this world, but seldom as much as he thinks he is.

To cure the Anglo-German war fever Europe should take a large dose of international brotherly love.

An Illinois man has worked out a system for living 100 years, but it is going to take time to give it a thorough test.

Vice and crime will hide their ugly heads in due course of time if there is anything in a monthly magazine crusade against them.

J. Pierpont Morgan has tried to buy a royal castle in Italy and failed, although he offered $5,000,000 for it, the Italian government claiming that no foreigner should be permitted to own the historic pile. In order to overcome the difficulty Mr. Morgan might buy Italy and thus cease to be a foreigner in that country.

Dr. Cook has so much trouble over his trips, that there would seem to be very little inducement for him to make another. There is a story told of a lawyer who was a bad husband, bad father, bad neighbor and generally a bad man morally, though he had been very successful in his profession. For the funeral a new preacher in the town was selected so that he would not know just what kind of a man the lawyer had been. The preacher eulogized him highly. When he had heard all he could stand to hear without unburdening himself to someone present, the judge of the court in that town leaned over to a lawyer who sat beside him and remarked, "Well, there's mighty little inducement for a really good man to die in Smithville now."

President Lowell, the new head of Harvard, adopts the current impression of the phase of Shakespeare's later life when he says in one of his recent addresses, discussing the ineffectiveness of mere opportunity: "Shakespeare himself did much of his writing under the pressure of finishing plays for the stage; and even Shakespeare, when rich enough to retire as a country gentleman, wrote no more." It is true that opportunity does not certainly, or even probably, produce results in any line of effort. There are thousands of concrete instances that could be cited to prove it. But we do not like to let the view go undisputed that Shakespeare ceased to write as soon as the necessity of earning money by his work was removed. It is true he produced no more after his retirement to Stratford. But one of his loving biographers contends that this was not Shakespeare's intention. He holds that it was the intention of the great bard of Avon to give his leisure to a careful revision of his hastily written plays; but that before he could adjust his affairs and settle down to work he was carried to an untimely grave by a sudden illness. The sanitary conditions of the vicinage in Shakespeare's time were extremely bad, and a glorious life was cut down in its prime by a sharp attack of fever, after only three days of illness. It is more satisfactory to think of Shakespeare as preparing to begin intellectual work anew, with better opportunities, than to think of him as planning a life of ease because a competence had been won. And it is almost intoxicating to imagine what a rich additional legacy the world of letters might have inherited from that prodigious intellect had his life been spared for leisurely authorship.

What constitutes an amateur in athletics is a problem which has long bothered the officials of athletic organizations, and especially those in authority at colleges and universities. It has developed bitter controversies, and distinctions have been drawn so fine that most people have had difficulty in recognizing them. Broadly speaking, every one knows that an amateur, as distinguished from a professional, does not compete for money. But that is only the beginning of the story. In the hope of bringing the leading governing bodies in the athletic world into closer agreement, the London Olympic committee has sent out a number of questions. Can a man be an amateur in one sport and a professional in another? Can a man recover amateur standing after once losing it? Does a man lose amateur standing through competing with a professional? Can an amateur receive expenses? These are some of the questions. There ought to be clearly defined and universally recognized rules governing amateurism, and it is hoped the efforts of the London committee will accomplish something toward this end. In this country, however, there is a feeling that English standards of amateurism are based too much on the idea that only the leisure class is free from a taint of professionalism. This, of course, is too snobbish for democratic America, where it is held that a boy, who works in a mill or store may nevertheless be strictly an amateur when he competes in games or sports on Saturday afternoon. There have been many reforms in college athletics in recent years, but the problem of amateurism is still troublesome. There are sharp differences on the subject of summer baseball, for example, and no doubt under the guise of "expenses" there are evils to be eradicated at many institutions. Sport for sport's sake is the athletic ideal, but like many ideals, it is exceedingly difficult of attainment.

BURGLARS' TOOLS.

Most of Them Made by Supposedly Respectable Mechanics.

Every little while, said a detective recently, the police arrest a man with a set of burglar's tools in his possession, and one naturally wonders where they all come from.

It is easy to buy a gun of any description, and the most reputable person would not be ashamed to be seen purchasing the most wicked-looking knife ever made. But who would know where to get a "jimmy" or a device for drilling into a safe or any of the many tools used by the professional burglar in the pursuit of his calling?

There are places in the large cities where these things are made and sold to the users, but such places are exceedingly scarce. It may seem a little strange to learn that most of the tools used in burglaries are made by mechanics who are looked upon as respectable men in the community.

When a burglar wants any particular tool made he goes to a mechanic who can do the job and pays him perhaps five times what it is actually worth for making the tool and keeping quiet about it. Many detectives can recall cases of this kind that have come to light.

One in particular occurred some years ago, when an escaped convict named Williams went to a blacksmith and got him to make a lot of drills to be used in safe cracking. He personally superintended the tempering of the steel, but when the job was nearly completed it leaked out, and Williams was arrested. In this instance the blacksmith knew nothing of the use to which the tools were to be put. Most of the tools used by burglars are secured in the same way.—Philadelphia Inquirer.

The Cheerful View.

The family horse, which rejoiced in the eminently proper name of Dobbin, had earned a rest by long service, and was accordingly sent away to the country to spend his declining years in the broad pastures of a farmer friend of his owner. The distance being somewhat excessive for his rheumatic legs, adds a writer in the Montreal Herald, he was shipped to his new home by rail.

Edna, the family 4-year-old, viewed the passing of Dobbin with unfeigned sorrow. She sat for a long time gazing disconsolately out of the window. At last, after a deep sigh, she turned with a more cheerful expression, and said:

"Did old Dobbin go in the cars mamma?"

"Yes, dear," answered her mother.

A broad grin spread over the little girl's face. "I was just thinking," she said, "how funny he must look sitting up on the plush cushions."

The Wisdom of Experience.

Men with improvident friends find it difficult to escape their importunities. A writer in the Chicago Post tells the story of such a man who was approached in a hotel one day by an old friend, never a very trustworthy person, and at that moment looking rather the worse for wear. The newcomer took a chair alongside his friend.

"I have a tip," he began, "on which I can make four dollars on the Board of Trade to-morrow, if I can get ten dollars to put up. I thought you might have the ten."

The other man reached into his pocket and handed him four dollars.

The man took the currency, and then hesitated.

"This is only four dollars," he explained. "I need ten."

"You said you expected to make only four dollars, didn't you? Consider that a loan, and leave the tip to some one else."

CHRIST TO COME AGAIN

Faith of Certain People and Sects in His Return Long Has Existed.

ADVENT WAS EXPECTED IN 1844

Out of the Miller Movement Came the Adventists, Who Number About 95,000.

The disappointment of a small body of believers in the coming to an end of the world which has just made a West Duxbury church a momentary object of attention is made the object of ridicule by some and of wonder by others, the New Bedford (Mass.) Standard says. We have in the faith of these few people and in their disappointment a recurrence of a phenomenon which the Christian church has witnessed more than once, on a more extended scale. The belief in the second coming of Christ at an early date has not been uncommon in the Christian church from the beginning. This idea has persisted and has appeared again and again, and is probably destined to a long, if lingering, life.

So far as this country is concerned, the greatest exhibition of expectation of the early second coming of Christ was at about the middle of the last century, when William Miller, a clergyman of the Baptist denomination, made up his mind that the advent would occur in 1843 or 1844. By means of an extremely literal interpretation of the imagery of the scriptural writers he came at last to be convinced that the end of the world would come on Oct. 22, 1844.

In some sections of the country, it was said that there was scarcely a Christian church in which there were not adherents of the idea, and occasionally a church was disrupted by it. The apostles of this evangel were difficult to contend with. After the disappointment that the predictions of Miller were not fulfilled there was the inevitable reaction. Some returned to their old churches, while some went adrift from all religious faith.

Out of the movement came the advent denomination, which has now six branches with about 95,000 communicants, and in which there is agreement that the second coming of Christ is to be personal and premillennial, and is close at hand, though few venture to fix dates. The differences between the branches are principally with relation to varying ideas about the immortality of the soul.

It is generally understood that in most branches of the Christian church there are men and women who in a vague and more or less speculative way believe in the early second coming of Christ and in the resultant end of the world as it now exists. Such beliefs are usually held quietly and not as occasion for difference. It is not strange, considering the origin and the history of Christianity, that the idea originated and has persisted.

DAUGHTER OF THE LATE RAILROAD KING BEGINS MANAGEMENT OF 33,000 ACRE ESTATE.

MISS MARY HARRIMAN

Miss Mary Harriman will be the greatest woman farmer in the United States, as by a family arrangement she has taken charge of Arden, at Turner, N. Y. The Arden farms include 14,000 acres, while altogether she will have supervision of 33,000 acres. Three thousand acres are now under cultivation, with much of it in truck farms. The Arden Farms Dairy, with a capitalization of $100,000, will be her special care. There are 350 registered cows, with butter sold every day in New York under contracts.

Miss Harriman has done much settlement work and is not at all fond of society. She is a musician and a linguist and is said to be able to converse even in Japanese. She is 25 years old, but looks much younger. She daily drives over the farm in a smart trap and is every day inspecting the roadmaking, the terracing of hills and landscape gardening which she planned with her father.

WHEN USURERS WERE HANGED.

Our Forefathers Were Less Lenient with Loan Sharks than We Are.

Society is strangely lenient with some classes of wrongdoers. Long terms in the penitentiary reward those who take our money from us by brute force or stealth, but there is no punishment for the usurer who robs the poor just as surely and far more safely.

A workingman in a steady job finds it the easiest thing in the world to borrow money from the usurer, and if he is not in a position to repay the loan when it matures all he has to do is to renew the note, a substantial bonus being added to the amount of the first loan. When he is thoroughly enmeshed the money lender takes particular pains to see that he does not escape. His wages are garnisheed now and then to prevent his being able to clear off the debt and another and bigger bonus is demanded for renewing the note. In the end the victim is working for the usurer and is allowed to retain for the support of his family only so much as the usurer is willing to let him have.

This looks more scoundrelly than highway robbery, yet the criminal law has overlooked it entirely, says the Detroit Journal. In a case now before Justice Lemkie the borrower owed a trifle over $20, and being unable to pay was given some $12 more and required to sign a note for $50, the difference between the $32 and the $50 representing the bonus he had to give for being allowed to borrow. To cover up that transaction he was handed a check for $50, which he had to indorse and return to the money lender. Thus the latter could and did say in court that he had given the man a check for $50 which had been cashed at the bank. So it was cashed, but it was the money lender who drew the money. It was extortion of a cleverly disguised kind, and had not the workman become desperate and refused to pay anything at all he might have remained in the power of the usurer for years.

Of scores, probably hundreds, this is the one case that comes to light, and when one is exposed all the courts can do is to liberate the man from the power of the usurer; it can do nothing to punish the usurer. Our forefathers were not so lenient in this respect. They punished the usurer with confiscation of his property, with torture and often with death.

White Horse of Kilburn.

The biggest artificial horse in the world is the famous white horse of Kilburn, England, which was formed fifty years ago by a native of Kilburn, who cut away the turf in the correct form and covered it with limestone. The whole occupies about two acres of ground and may be seen twenty miles away. It is said that twenty persons can sit on the "eye" of the horse.

Dangerous Ground.

"Allow me to congratulate you on your speech——"

"Don't do that," replied the young member of the diplomatic service. "If I have said anything calculated to attract notice there is no telling how much trouble it may make me."—Washington Star.

YOUNG GOTHAM MERCHANTS.

Early Start Made by Juveniles to Build Up Business.

They certainly do start 'em young in this camp, the New York correspondent of the Cincinnati Times-Star says. Away up in the Washington Heights section a small kid has been running a news stand. He isn't much more than large enough to see over the little table on which he displays his morning and evening papers, but he is always there with the brief grin when a customer comes along and he never makes a mistake after the second day as to what particular paper that customer buys to read on the way downtown. It began to look as if the kid had a fairly profitable little business started, when the other morning one of the regular patrons approached the stand. No one was in sight, but as the patron paused by it the oilcloth curtains that concealed its shaky legs parted and out rolled a plump, dirty little brat, about half the size of the proprietor. He thrust the right paper into the customer's hand and stuck out a grubby little paw for the penny.

"But what are you doing under the stand?" asked the astounded buyer.

"Playin' house—wid Wosie," said the juvenile clerk.

Hearing her name, "Wosie" rolled into view, presenting herself as a phenomenally smeared apparition of 3 years, clutching a candy-daubed doll to her breast. The lord of the manor seemed to be in a communicative mood. "Me bruvver's started a new stand," he said, "an' I git half what I make out of dis one. By and by I'm goin' to have a stand of me own, and then Wosie gits this one."

As the customer passed on, gasping, the boss and "Wosie" rolled under the stand again, to resume the fascinating occupation of playing house. Through the cleft in the curtains one brigat black eye might be seen peering, squirrel-like, awaiting the arrival of possible buyers.

Making Herself at Home.

Last summer five-year-old Lola's aunt came to spend a week with them.

"Now, aunty," said Lola, "you must make yourself at home."

"How can I do that, dear?" queried her aunt.

"Why," answered Lola, "you can pitch in and help mamma work."—Chicago News.

A man was "setting up" cigars today because of the arrival of his first grandchild, and seemed quite happy. "I don't believe that would please me very much," another man said.

Busy Days for President Taft.

During his swing through the West and South President Taft has made voluminous promises of reforms to be enacted by the administration during the coming session of Congress. If he carries out even a majority of these assurances his work will be cut out. Even his strenuous predecessor never outlined a program so extensive and diversified.

Here are the principal matters that President Taft has pledged the administration to accomplish:

Creation of a central bank of issue which shall control the treasury reserve and deal with currency stringencies.

Establishment of a postal savings bank system.

Adoption of the proposed amendment to the constitution authorizing the levying of an income tax, such tax to be enforced only in cases of national emergency.

Addition of a feature to the corporation tax imposing a tax upon interest to be paid, thus reducing the amount of interest a corporation would pay to bondholders to the extent of the tax collected.

Recommendation that no further changes be made in the tariff during the administration.

States, not the federal government, to correct swollen fortunes by means of drastic inheritance laws.

Amendments to the anti-trust law and opposition to excepting the trades union class from the operation of such laws.

Amendments to the Hepburn interstate commerce act providing for the creation of a court to pass upon appeals from decisions fixing rates made by the Interstate Commerce Commission; authority for the commission to determine the proper classification of merchandise for transportation; authority for the commission to initiate complaints of discrimination in rates; granting the commission power to compel connecting carriers to unite in forming through routes and to fix the rate and apportionment thereof among the carriers; prohibition of railroads to hold stock in competing roads; requiring railroads to obtain the approval of the Interstate Commerce Commission to all issues of stocks and bonds, which issues must be for legitimate purposes and free of "water;" authority for railroads to make agreements on rates approved by the commission; addition of an accusatory bureau to the Department of Justice to prosecute violations of the interstate commerce and anti-trust laws.

Proper legal definition of cases in which preliminary injunctions may issue without notice in labor disputes and of the procedure to be pursued in such matters.

Requiring interstate railroads to adopt additional safety devices.

Appointment of a Congressional commission to investigate the cause of delays in the federal courts and development of a system which shall secure quick and cheap justice in the federal courts and serve as a model for the States.

Conservation of natural resources.

Reclamation of arid lands and issuances of certificates for the purpose.

Preservation of forests.

Deepening of waterways.

Reorganization of the public land system.

Reorganization of government departments in Washington, particularly the Department of Justice, Interstate Commerce Commission and Bureau of Corporations.

Prosecution and punishment of all violators of the law, even of the most powerful, which includes clearer definition of the statutes relating to business.

Enforcement of the pure-food law.

Peace and friendship and development of closer relations with Japan.

This is another case in which it will be interesting to compare promise with performance.

Protect Our National Credit.

For the first time in thirty years United States bonds have sold below par, Panama 2 per cents changing hands the other day at 99⅞.

These bonds are bought by banks to deposit as a basis for the issue of bank notes. What will happen if Senator Aldrich's central bank monopolizes the issue of currency, thus removing from national banks the necessity of buying government bonds? Who is going to buy government 2 per cents, with so many other safe available investments that will pay higher interest?

The cash balance on hand of the United States treasury is small, the deficit of currency expenses over revenue is piling up every day, and national bonds are depreciating in value. What is the cause?

Theodore Roosevelt's reckless extravagance set a pace in national waste of money which left the White House mortgaged. Under President Taft conditions have not improved. Public funds have been squandered shamelessly. Vast armies of employes have been added to the public pay roll. Millions of dollars have been spent in projects of questionable value. Large additional expenditures are proposed. No sign of economy is apparent.

On the contrary, there is every indication that President Taft proposes to increase the public burden, raise tax rates, and pour out millions to be absorbed by Republican grand dukes like the Sahara desert swallowing up Niagara.

For the sake of national credit, and in the interest of preventing the financial upheaval that must result if present conditions continue, it is to be hoped that Mr. Taft's cabinet advisers will insist on retrenchment at Washington, and protect the treasury department from the possible influence of certain high financiers who may desire to further their own ends at public expense.—Chicago Journal.

The Central Bank Danger.

If Senator Aldrich's central bank scheme should by any mishap become law nothing could prevent control of this great national financial institution passing into the hands of the Wall street captains of finance.

The actual value of securities of every kind depends upon the safety and earning power. The Aldrich central bank would control interest rates. To intrust such unlimited power to a little coterie of money kings or their political puppets would be disastrous.

Thus armed, they could stop or start the wheels of commerce to please themselves; they could render the securities of any company safe or unsafe; they could create panics and allay them without hindrance. In short, they would hold life-and-death power in the business world.

No such autocracy can be permitted. Every banker and business man should exert his influence to prevent it.—Chicago Journal.

No Need of Ship Subsidies.

As the discussion of ship subsidies proceeds it becomes each day more apparent that there is no necessity of taxing the people of the United States to build up a merchant marine.

Three causes contributed to the decay of the shipping industry.

The substitution of iron for wood made it impossible for the American sailing clipper to compete with the steam freighter.

The high protective import duty on iron and steel made the cost of building freighters in the United States so high that they could not compete with freighters built abroad.

The law denying American register to foreign-built ships prevented American ship owners from purchasing ships abroad and sailing them under the American flag.

A ship subsidy bill is to be introduced at the next session of Congress. Representatives of the people must not be deluded by prophecies of great trade with the orient and South America on completion of the Panama canal. This trade is merely a possibility, and has nothing to do with the desirability or necessity of ship subsidies.

If subsidies are right after the Panama ditch is completed they are right now. If subsidies are wrong now, they will be wrong when the canal is in operation.

There is no lack of ocean tonnage to carry all American freight. Idle freighters are tied up in every great port for lack of cargo. Barely 5 per cent of our manufactured products are exported. Our highly protected manufacturers have no desire to export a larger proportion because they can make higher profits in the home market than abroad.

From what source, then, is to come the freight for the merchant marine that the people are urged to subsidize?

The Journal doubts that a ship subsidy would create a merchant navy. Senator Elkins has shown that a subsidy can be provided at the expense of the tariff barons, if necessary. All the available facts do not show that a subsidy is necessary or advisable.—Chicago Journal.

The Redemption of David Corson

CHAPTER XVI.—(Continued.)

With a swift, instinctive movement both of them turned away. Each read in the other's face consciousness of the impossibility of discussing those experiences through which they had come to be what they were. Such men guard the real history of their lives and the real emotions of their hearts as jealously as the combinations of their cards. The old, ironical smile lighted up Mantel's features, and he said:

"We seem to have a violent antipathy to thin ice, Davy, and skate away from it as soon as it begins to crack a little beneath our feet."

"Yes," said his friend, shrugging his shoulders, "it is not pleasant to fall through the crust of friendship. There is a sub-element in every life a too sudden plunge into which might result in a fatal chill. We had all better keep on the surface. I am frank enough to say that the less any one knows about my past, the better I shall be satisfied."

"I wish that I could keep my own self from invading that realm as easily as I can keep others! Why is it that no man has ever yet been able to 'let the dead past bury its dead'? It seems a reasonable demand."

"He's a poor sexton—this old man, the Past. I have watched him at his work, and he is powerless to dig his own grave, however many others he may have excavated!"

"The Present seems as helpless at the Past. I wonder if the future will hasn enough new events over old ones to hide them from view?"

"Let a shadow bury the sun! Let a wave bury the sea," answered David, bitterly.

Mantel dropped his eyes in silence. For the first time since David had known him his fine face gave some genuine revelation of the emotions of his soul. Great tears gathered in his eyes, and his lips trembled. In a moment, he arose, took his hat, laid his hand gently upon the arm of his friend, and said, "David, my dear fellow, we are skating on that thin ice again. We shall fall through if—are not careful and get that chill you were talking about. Let's go out and take a walk. Life is too deep for either you or me to fathom. I gave it up as a bad job long ago. Come, let us go. We need the air."

They went down into the streets and lost themselves in the busy crowd of care-encumbered men. Suddenly Mantel was startled by an abrupt change in the manner of his companion, who paused and stood as if rooted to the pavement, while his great blue eyes opened beyond their natural width with a fixed stare.

Following the direction of their gaze, Mantel saw that they were fixed on a blind beggar who sat on a stool at the edge of the sidewalk, silent and motionless like an old snag on the bank of a river—the perpetual stream of human life forever flowing by. His head was bare; in his outstretched hand he held a tin cup which jingled now and then as some compassionate traveler dropped him a coin; by his side, looking up occasionally into his unresponsive eyes, was a little terrier, his solitary companion and guide in a world of perpetual night.

The face of the man was a remarkable one, judged by almost any standard. It was large in size, strong in outline, and although he was a beggar, it wore an expression of power, of independence and resolution like that of another Belisarius. But the feature which first arrested and longest held attention, was an enormous moustache. It could not have been less than fourteen inches from tip to tip, was carefully trimmed and trained, and although the man himself was still comparatively young, was white as snow. Occasionally he set his cup on his knee and with both hands twisted the ends into heavy ropes.

It was a striking face and exacted from every observer more than a passing look, but remarkable as it was, Mantel could not discover any reason for the strained and terrible interest of his companion, who stood staring so long and in such a noticeable way, that he was in danger of himself attracting the attention of the curious crowd.

Seeing this, Mantel took him by the arm. "What is the matter?" he asked.

"It is he!" cried David, drawing his hand over his eyes like a man awakening from a dream; "it is he!"

"It is who? Are you mad! Come away! People are observing you. If there is anything wrong, we must move or get into trouble."

"Let me alone!" David replied, shaking off his hand. "I would rather die than lose sight of that man."

"Then come into this doorway where you can watch him unobserved, for you are making a spectacle of yourself. Come, or I shall drag you."

With his eyes still riveted on that strange countenance, David yielded to the pressure of his friend's hand and they retired to a hallway whence he could watch the beggar unobserved. His whole frame was quivering with excitement and he kept murmuring to himself: "It is he. It is he! I cannot be mistaken! Nature never made his double! But how he has changed! How old and white he is! It cannot be his ghost, can it? If it were night I might think so, but it is broad daylight! This man is living flesh and blood and my hand is not, after all, the hand of a mur——"

"Hush!" cried Mantel; "you are talking aloud!"

"Yes, I am talking aloud," he answered, "and I mean to talk louder yet! I want you to hear that I am not a murderer, a murderer! Do you understand? I am going to rush out into the streets to cry out at the top of my voice—I am not a murderer!"

Terrified at his violence, Mantel pushed him farther back into the doorway; but he sprang out again as if his very life depended upon the sight of the great white face.

"Be quiet!" Mantel cried, seizing his arm with an iron grip.

"Look at this hand, Mantel! I have not looked at it myself for more than three years without seeing spots of blood on it! And now it looks as white as snow to me!"

"You are in danger of being overheard, and if you are not careful, in a moment more we shall be in the hands of the police!"

"No matter if I am," cried David, almost beside himself, and rapturously embracing his friend. "Nothing could give me more pleasure than a trial for my crime, for my victim would be my witness! He is not dead. He is out there in the street. Mantel, you don't know what happiness it! You don't know how sweet it is to be alive! A mountain has been taken from my shoulders. I no longer have any secret! I will tell you the whole story of my life, now."

"Not now; but later on, when we are alone."

David had now grown more quiet, and they stood patiently waiting for the time to come when the old beggar should leave his post and retire to his home, if home he had. At last he received his signal for departure. A shadow fell from the roof of the tall building opposite, upon the pupil of an eye, which perhaps felt the darkness it could not see. The building was his dial. Like millions of his fellow creatures, he measured life by advancing shadows.

He arose, and in his mien and movements there was a certain majesty. Placing his hat upon his storm-beaten head, he folded the camp-chair under his arm, took the leading string in his hand and followed the little dog, who began picking his way with fine care through the surging crowd.

Behind him at a little distance walked the two gamblers, pursuing him like a double shadow. A bloodhound could not have been more eager than David was. He trembled if an omnibus cut off his view for a single instant, and shuddered if the beggar turned a corner.

Unconscious of all this, the dog and his master wended their way homeward. They crawled slowly and quietly across a street over which thundered an endless procession of vehicles; they moved like snails through the surf of the ocean of life. Arriving at length at the door of a wretched tenement house, the blind man and his dog entered.

As he noted the squalor of the place, David murmured to himself, "Poor old man! How low he has fallen!"

Several minutes passed in silence, while he stood reflecting on the doctor's misery, his own new happiness and the opportunities and duties which the adventure had opened and imposed. At last he said to his friend, "Do you know where we are? I was so absorbed that I didn't notice our route at all."

"Yes," Mantel answered. "I have marked every turn of the way."

"Could you find the place again?"

"Without the slightest difficulty."

"Be sure, for if you wish to help me, as I think you do, you will have to come often. I have made my plans in the few moments in which I have been standing here, and am determined to devote my life, if need be, to this poor creature whom I have so wronged. I must get him out of this filthy hole into some cheerful place. I will atone for the past if I can! Atone! What a word that is! With what stunning force its meaning dawns upon me! How many times I have heard and uttered it without comprehension. But somehow I now see in it a revelation of the sweetest possibility of life. Oh! I am a changed man; I will make atonement! Come, let us go. I am anxious to begin. But no, I must proceed with caution. How do I know that this is his permanent home? He may be only lodging for the night, and when you come to-morrow, he may be gone! Go in, Mantel, and make sure that we shall find him here to-morrow. Go, and while you find out all you can about him, I will begin to search for such a place as I want to put him in. We will part for the present; but when we meet to-night we shall have much to talk about. I will tell you the whole of this long and bitter story. I am so happy, Mantel. You can't understand! I have something to live for now. I will work, oh, you do not know how I will work to make this atonement. What a word it is! It is music to my ears. Atonement!"

And so in the lexicon of human experience he had at last discovered the meaning of one of the great words of our language. After all, experience is the only exhaustive dictionary, and the definitions it contains are the only ones which really burn themselves into the mind or fully interpret the significances of life.

CHAPTER XVII.

The next few weeks were passed in devoted efforts to make the blind man comfortable and happy. David sought and found a place to work, and after reserving enough of his wages to supply the few necessities of his daily life, dedicated the rest to the purchase of comforts for the poor invalid.

Mantel acted as his almoner, and by his delicate tact and gentle manners persuaded the proud and revengeful old man to accept the mysterious charity. The moment the strain of perpetual beggary was taken from him, the physical ruin which the terrible blow of the stone, the subsequent illness, and the ensuing poverty and wretchedness had wrought, became manifest. He experienced a sudden relapse, and began to sink into an ominous decline.

Even had he not known the secret of his sorrow, it would have soon become plain to his acute and watchful nurse that some hidden trouble was gnawing at his heart, for he was taciturn, abstracted and sometimes morose. He manifested no curiosity as to the benefactor upon whose charity he was living, but received the alms bestowed by that unknown hand unsolicited, uncomprehended and unobserved.

His mind, aroused by the conversation of his untiring nurse to the realities of the present existence, would sink back by a sort of irresistible gravity into the realm of memory. There, in the impenetrable privacy of his soul, he brooded over his wrongs and counted his prospects of righting them, as a miser reckons his coins.

The blow struck by David had stunned the doctor, but had not killed him. He lay in the road until a slave, passing that way, picked him up and carried him to a neighboring plantation, where he fell into the hands of people who in the truest sense of the word were good Samaritans. Their hospitality was tested to the utmost, for he lay for weeks in a stupor, and when he recovered consciousness his reason had undergone a strange eclipse. For a long time he could not recall a single event in his history and when at last some of the most prominent began to re-present themselves to his view it was vaguely and slowly, as mountain-peaks and hill-tops break through a morning mist. This was not the only result of the blow which his rival had struck him; it had left him totally blind.

Not until many weeks had passed did Mantel succeed in really engaging his patient in anything like a conversation, and even after he had begun to thaw a little under those tactful ministrations of love, whenever the past was even hinted at the old recluse relapsed instantly into silence.

Mantel might have been discouraged had he not determined at all hazards to enter into the secrets of this life, and to pave the way for the forgiveness of his friend. He therefore persisted in his efforts, and one bright day when the invalid was feeling unusually strong ventured to press home his inquiries.

"I cannot help thinking," he said, "that you could soon be reasonably well again if you did not brood so much. I fear there is some trouble gnawing at your heart."

"There is," he was answered, icily.

"Have you wronged some one, then, and are these thoughts which vex you feelings of remorse and guilt?"

"Wronged some one!" the sick man fairly roared, gripping the arms of his chair and gasping for breath in the excitement which the question brought on. "Not I! I have been wronged! No one has ever b-b-been wronged as I have. I have nourished vipers in my b-b-bosom and been stung by them. I have sown love and reaped hate. I have been robbed, deceived and betrayed! My wife is gone! My health is gone! My sight is gone! He has skinned me like a sheep! My heart has turned to a hammer which knocks at my ribs and cries revenge! It ch-ch-chokes me!"

He gasped, grew purple in the face and clutched at his collar as if about to strangle. After a while the paroxysm passed away, and Mantel determined once more to try and assuage this implacable hatred.

(To be continued.)

FLOWERS OR BUTTONS.

The Simple African Belle Preferred Her Own Means of Adornment.

Buttons have been so much in request this season for decorative as well as merely useful purposes that button factories have been working overtime, and have found it difficult to meet the demand. Paris has commanded the use of buttons, and the fashionable world has hastened to comply.

Nevertheless, its response has been anticipated by unsophisticated Africa. The belles of the West Coast, as Robert H. Milligan has recently described them in his "Jungle Folk of Africa," outbutton even the most thickly button-studded of imported Parisian creations.

To be sure, tropical garments being light and scanty, they prefer to bedeck their coiffures instead of their costumes; but the principle is the same. The buttons employed are quite as numerous, and quite as unnecessary. This is how the Bulu bells do their hair:

"Crossing it back and forth over strips of bamboo, they build it into three or four ridges, several inches high, running from the front to the back of the head. Each ridge is mounted with a close row of common white shirt buttons. When shirt buttons cannot be procured, a certain small shell is used. Sometimes the ridges are circular, one within another, like a story cake, iced with shirt buttons.

"In addition to this the women often sew on above each ear a card containing as many as six dozen buttons. Sometimes they also build a kind of splashboard behind the head, from ear to ear, to hold more buttons. The hair thus arranged remains undisturbed for several months.

"Across the middle of the forehead they wear several strings of beads, or sometimes a strip of monkey skin an inch wide, edged with shirt buttons, and fastened behind the head. They also have bangles three inches to a foot long, all round the head, consisting of loose hair strung with beads of all colors. But there is still room for more, and they wear round the neck countless strings of small blue-black bead, piled up sometimes several inches high on the shoulders.

"Occasionally they pierce the septum of the nose and insert a string of beads or a brass ring; and the ears are treated in the same manner. A black tattooed marking between the eyes and two broad artistically designed lines of the same upon the cheeks, running from the ear toward the mouth, complete the head ornamentation of a fashionable Bulu woman."

Mr. Milligan records that, seeing a woman engaged in her "semiannual duty of combing her hair," he suggested the possibilities of bright flowers rather than buttons; he even politely gathered some and tried the effect against her dark head, which was excellent.

"But to her they were ridiculous; nor was she moved when I told her that white women in my country infinitely preferred flowers to shirt buttons."—Youth's Companion.

Method.

"What makes you keep on asking me if the razor hurts?" asked the man who was being shaved. "I've said 'yes' three times and it hasn't made any difference."

"No," answered the barber. "I was merely trying my razors out to see which of 'em wants honing."—Washington Star.

WOMEN'S INTERESTS

The Heart's Desire.

"God give you your heart's desire,
Whatever it be," she said;
Then down the gallery's shining length
Like a thing of light she sped.

Her face was a stranger's face;
Her name I shall never know;
But softly here benediction fell
As the night winds breathing low.

Who knoweth the heart's desire?
Its innermost secret dreams?
Its holiest shrine where the altar lights
Forever and ever gleam!

Who guesseth the heart's desire?
Ah, neither you nor I!
It hideth away in darkling space
From the gaze of the passerby.

Who giveth the heart's desire
To the child that cries for the moon?
Or the samite robe and the Holy Grail
To the soul that was born too soon?

Who giveth the heart's desire
To the lover whose love lies dead?
Or the priest who faces the silence
With the living word unsaid?

Who giveth the heart's desire
To the poet with harp unstrung,
When he droppeth the trembling lyre
With his noblest song unsung?
—Julia C. R. Dorr.

Woman.

With the growth of human brotherhood, and its necessary correlative, popular government, woman, as a part of glorified humanity and elevated with its uplift, found herself side by side with man; his helper not only, as formerly, in things temporal, but his companion in all things. To-day all forces in human existence and human relations have been exalted and refined. As far removed as is the beast of burden from the electrician's wire, so far is the woman of the earlier years from her sister of the twentieth century's dawn.

As the humanitarian idea has plowed its day through human history, woman has developed with that idea, and now her finer instincts, her keener intuitions, and her patient heart are the full complement of the robust masculinity which has conquered nature. The two united glorify humanity. It is no longer a question of man or woman, but of quality of service, and of power to meet the world's need.
—Mrs. J. Ellen Foster.

American Sportswomen.

We have heard sometimes that American men are so keen to win the games they play that some of them are rather unsporting, not only in the spirit but in the letter. If this is so, then their womankind must be, and, indeed, say they are, a superior creation, as no one makes a more delightful opponent than an American lady. I remember when one of them was being condoled with on suffering defeat from one of the leading Welsh players she said with a cheerful smile: "I guess she played better golf than I did—so I can't grunt." Could anything have shown a more sporting spirit than that?—Lady's Pictorial.

New Embroidered Collar.

Most of the new blouses are cut out at the neck in Dutch fashion about an inch below the lower edge of the high stock. This stock is set on a shallow yoke of the same material, sometimes stock and yoke being of lace. With ordinary shirtwaists stock and yoke are of silk, as in the illustration. Below this silk stock and yoke a dainty little embroidered collar sets around the top of the Dutch neck opening. These little collars are of white linen, or of delicately colored linen the embroidery being done in the same shade. A more dainty or becoming finish for a dark shirtwaist could scarcely be imagined.

Precepts for Housekeeper.

If you have daughters, teach them to knit and spin, and to keep the family accounts.

If you lend a man or woman a small sum, be sure to ask for it before he or she forgets it.

If you have a family and are not very affluent, remember that a pin a day is a groat a year.

Old shoes make good slippers, and need not be denied the blacking brush because they are old indoor servants.

Do not put too much money in your children's pockets in going to school. It is sowing the seeds of prodigality.

The Fasting Cure.

The fashionable remedy for most ailments is semi-starvation. It has taken medical science a long time to get back to the first principles. When animals feel badly they refuse to eat. As soon as the system is cleared of its accumulation of extraneous matter nature cures the disturbance. When a human feels out of sorts the first thing is to take something. Colds in the head are almost always caused by overeating, and colds lead to a great many other troubles. The only really healthy individuals are those who eat sparingly. Really, our greatest enemies are those who urge us to eat. Eating is necessary up to a certain point, but almost everyone eats too much.—Agricultural Epitomist.

A STREET HAT FOR WINTER

The walking hat of the day will be large or small, as one wishes. There never was more liberty in clothes than now. The sketch not only shows an admirable hat, but it gives the proper detail of neckwear and the new revers on coats. The hat is of soft felt faced with panne velvet, and with a crown of the same. The immense wings tilt widely to the side. It is worn down on the forehead, showing a little of the new coiffure, which is parted at the side and brushed back. The stock is of white mull, wrinkled and well boned and finished with two gathered flounces in front, scalloped and buttonholed. The revers are edged with black Ottoman silk, and at each buttonhole is an immense jet button.

Fads and Fancies in Dress

Close-fitting styles will continue.

Some long coats of the most elaborate nature are seen.

Faded reds are in again for coat suits on younger women.

Striped suts are in favor, but the effects are rather indefinite.

The toqué still reigns supreme for walking in Paris, and is seen in wide variation.

While gilt buckles still retain their favor, some fancy footwear have buckles matching the color of the gown.

The new draperies for autumn are striking in effect. Birds and leaves and flowers riot over them in gorgeous abundance.

The new lingerie still shows the effect of ruthless suppression. It has lost none of its prettiness, but is no longer aggressive.

Mousseline and gauze ruching is used to finish gowns at the ends of the sleeves, around the bottom of the skirt and elsewhere.

The various wine and maroon shades are to be very good style; violet, plum and purple shades will be modish, but not to such an extent as heretofore.

Use for Discarded Woolen Hose.

Old woolen stockings should not be wasted. If the legs are opened out they, either single or joined together, are excellent in the place of furniture polishers and of house flannel. The cut-off feet serve for the rubbing on of beeswax and turpentine and other polishes. Women who do not care to use up their old stockings in this way may like to utilize them for charity. The legs of two full-size stockings opened out and then joined up together will make a warm little under-bodice or vest for a child. The stocking hem makes the lower part of vest, which is finished off round the neck and sleeves with a crochet edging. Stocking legs, three or four of them, will also make a poor child an acceptable petticoat; the petticoat should be sewn into a straight band or on to a calico bodice.

Learn to Sit Down.

A quaint old woman used to say, "There ain't no sense in them that has chairs being tired. Why don't they sit in them?" This is not a half bad question for many a weary housekeeper to ask herself. She would find life much easier, would fight off the wrinkles longer and would generally be brighter and happier if she could learn to sit down whenever a chance presents itself. It is worth while to obtain comfortable chairs for almost every household task. Except sweeping, scrubbing and bedmaking there are few tasks about a house which cannot be done just as well sitting as standing.

For Indoor Plants.

A great number of indoor plants die every year because they are not properly watered. To tell if a plant needs water press the finger firmly into the earth around the roots. If the earth is dry and does not soil the finger, the plant needs a good soaking. Remember, a thorough soaking two or three times a week is far better than daily dribbles of water.

Wash the leaves of all indoor plants once a week. If they are not kept clean the plant will never thrive. The tiny pores in the leaves need to be kept open just as the pores of the human skin require to be kept in a like condition. When they have been watered keep them in the shade until the leaves are quite dry.

Palms and aspidistras and plants of this nature should be carefully sponged before the leaves are watered. Use slightly warm water, and support each leaf with the hand so that it will not get bruises.

Aspidistras are rather expensive to buy, but they thrive better than any other plant in an ordinary living room.

If they become tired looking, take a bucket, and fill it with soapsuds, to which a little ammonia has been added and let the pot stand in this for half an hour. The ammonia and soap act as a tonic.

New Ways to Comb the Hair.

It still takes time to do up one's hair. New styles look simple, but in this case looks deceive. The contour of the choiffure is so astonishingly different that one can waste a lot of time in the effort to be fashionable.

A light wire frame is placed about the head and over this is smoothly wrapped a long uncurled switch. In front is a puffy fringe about the face, and at the back is a soft large knot of hair. With the new fashion ribbon bows and bands may be worn and fewer combs—which is a good thing for the health of the hair.

Renovating a Worn Carpet.

When flowers or designs in carpets become faded or worn, get dyes the color required and dilute by directions given. Take small paint brushes, dip into the different dyes and paint the flowers or other faded parts. Be careful not to use too much dye at a time or it will run into the next color. With patience and pains the work is easily done and the result is surprisingly good.

Women Want New Bureau.

At the convention of the National Women's Trade Union League in Chicago resolutions were adopted favoring the creation of a federal bureau to collect data in connection with women in industrial pursuits. The women want a woman as head of the bureau.

Memories of the War

A Remarkable Shot.

When Lee found himself at last hemmed in on all sides at Petersburg, and the once proud strength of the Army of Northern Virginia no longer capable of obeying the master mind, the hour of a mighty crisis presented itself between the two veteran armies stretching, face to face, for miles, in compass before the beleaguered city.

The 29th of March, 1865, was close at hand; ere the sun had risen and sunk twice again the whole Army of the Potomac well knew the inexorable "Hammerer" would inaugurate his bold initial stroke to crush his shattered opponent.

Gallant Sheridan had joined the army, and his sturdy troops were eager for the bugle's resounding charge.

A strange and romantic incident marked the temporary bivouac of the cavalry that night of the 27th and the afternoon following.

Located close by the ripples of Chamberlain creek was a pretty yet modest dwelling; within were seated an aged lady and her daughter—the latter beauteous of face and form, with soft brown eyes and waving curls of chestnut hair. The two were the sole occupants of the house; the husband and father was even then on the opposite side of those gray-manned earthworks destined to be the last ditch of the Confederacy.

Suddenly there was a knock at the door, and almost ere the girl could step forward in answer to the summons, a captain of Union cavalry came hurriedly and familiarly into the little sitting room.

"Mrs. Dean!" he saluted. "It has been long since we met: Isabel, I greet you!"

"Ah, Harold Prentiss, this unexpected visit can hardly be realized!" exclaimed the girl, while she permitted him to take her hands warmly; "and you are, indeed, with the army of the North?"

"Yes, one of Sheridan's boys."

His welcome was cordial, but he saw that there was some deep anxiety in their hearts.

"Years," he continued, "since last we met. Just think, Isabel! And even the stern tide of war has brought us once again together. You are true blue, Isabel—and your mother?"

"We would be, Harold," answered the mother, with bowed head, "but we must pray for the gray, because Isabel's father is with Lee."

"There do not weep, Mrs. Dean. Soon all will be over, and George Dean, we must hope, will come safely back to you. But now I have not many minutes. I have actually stolen the pleasure of this visit to ask Isabel—as I asked her before I fled to join the warriors of our starry banner—if she will be my wife? I have been true to my love for you, Isabel, all these years. The end of the war is at hand; the great southern leader himself must know it. I speak, Isabel——"

"Harold, I cannot decide. Ah, did I not tell you, years ago, that I could not choose between two such lovers as yourself and Mart Diering?"

"You still talk that way," he said, with latent reproach, "when you know that even in the long ago he resorted to tricks to win you from me?"

"Ay, to-day," she rejoined, with drooping head. "I confess I love both too well to make solemn choice of either."

"Can nothing decide you?"

A third voice sounded unexpectedly. Across the threshold stepped another of Sheridan's brave captains. Mart Diering himself, and while Isabel did not shrink from the warm grasp he, too, gave her hands, he half faced about, saying:

"I think I can suggest a way to settle this, Captain Prentiss. You and I were famous marksmen when we roamed these same fields together before the war. Now, one of us must win sweet Isabel. What say? let us target for the rare prize, if she will give assent, the luckiest bullseye to be the winner."

"Isabel, do you consent to this?" Harold asked, eagerly.

An instant she hesitated, then answered:

"Be it so. Whichever of you shall strike the target nearest to the very center, that one I will marry."

"To-morrow afternoon we may manage this affair in the orchard at the rear of this house," said Diering.

The rival captains separated.

Prentiss communicated to his waiting orderly, Jack Banks, what was in prospect.

"All right, Captain," said Banks, in an unnecessarily hard voice; "I'll mark your bullet with crosses, one on each side, so that there shall be no mistake when you plug the center, for I know you are a quicker shot than Captain Diering."

Then the orderly turned his head and watched a skulking figure hastening toward Diering's horse. It was the latter Captain's orderly.

"He heard me and that's what I wanted—the rascal!" Banks muttered. "The bullet marked with crosses will be fired by Captain Diering, but it will not win, or I am mistaken in my own hunter's cunning and my Captain's quickness."

Notwithstanding the excited though systematic preparation for unleashing the army for the preliminary assault at Five Forks, the rival captains were at the orchard in the rear of the Dean dwelling, each accompanied by a few men from his company. A small target was improvised against a tree, and Banks, having become master of the ceremonies by skillful tossing of the button, he said:

"Comrades—and you, ladies—this contest requires that the winner shall strike the target nearest the center. Comprehend my words, please."

"It is as you have stated," declared Isabel, grimly, but with fluttering heart.

"Ready!" he cried. And the two marksmen gripped their weapons with steady nerves.

"Aim!—fire!"

A double report, mingled in one, broke the stillness of the orchard.

The face of Banks was beaming. He knew that, almost imperceptible as it would seem, the shot from the rifle of his Captain was ahead by a fraction of a second.

"Wait!" he intercepted, as all would have rushed forward. "Is there any way in which you could identify your bullet, Captain Diering?"

"Yes. My bullet is marked by two crosses, one on each or opposite sides."

"Good. Then let me tell you all that Captain Prentiss' rifle has shot no bullet at all. I loaded the weapon myself, and its missile was a portion of a ramrod. Now, forward, and let us see the result."

Troopers and contestants crowded around the target, and there was instantly a murmur of astonishment.

In the very center of the target protruded a part of a ramrod, with its cup outermost. In the cup was a partly flattened ball, wedged tightly, and when the latter was extracted it bore the traces of two cross marks!

"What does this mean?" demanded Captain Diering, angrily.

"The terms were very plain," replied Banks, with a complacent smile of triumph. "Your bullet has not even touched the target; my captain has hit the mark plumb center——"

"A trick! It is not fair!"

"These are war times, captain" maintained Banks, stoutly. "This is a conquest within the terms.

Turning to Isabel, the faithful orderly continued:

"Do not forget, lady, that all is fair in love as in war, where victory is the goal."

Harold was himself astounded, but quickly availing of Banks' remarkable scheme, he stepped to the side of the beautiful girl.

"Isabel, have I not won you?"

"Yes."

At that juncture a distant blast of bugles wafted through the orchard.

A hurried kiss, a quick "good-by," and the captains were galloping swiftly away to rejoin their regiments.

Of the bloody scenes and valorous deeds which followed, when the boys of Sheridan swept to and fro in mortal combat with the gray between Hatchers Run and Dinwiddie Court House, the new generation has read and marveled upon, and the clash of saber upon bayonet and the wild yells of desperate foemen are still in the ears of those among the steel-bristling horsemen of the gallant generals who now survive.

Both captains lived to see the triumph of the stars and stripes, and in the tranquil dawn of peace Harold returned to claim his strongly won bride, fair Isabel Dean.

The Veteran Saw It All.

An old man with silvery hair was led into the cyclorama of Gettysburg in New York by a bright-faced little miss in a jaunty gypsy hat and dress, and sat down while she described to him the features of the picture in detail, occasionally asking her a question or shaking his head slowly, as if in doubt of the accuracy of her account. She had described to him in her own way the on-rush of Pickett's men and the hand-to-hand conflict at the stone fence where the Pennsylvania veterans met the charge of the Southerners, when he asked, "But where's the artillery, Mag?"

"Oh, you mean the big guns. They're over there on the hill in a row."

"All in a row?" he asked.

"Yes," she replied.

He shook his head. "Look around," said he. "There must be some more that are not in line."

"Yes," she said. "There are some down here, but they are all upset and seem to be broken. I think they are busted."

"Is that where the men are coming over the stone wall?"

"Yes, grandpa."

"Is there a grove of trees?"

"Yes, grandpa. It seems to be full of men, but the smoke is so thick you cannot see them."

"Oh, I can see them," he cried.

It was then noticed by several people who were listening to him that he was blind. The little girl said: "Oh, no, grandpa, you can't see them."

"Yes, I can," he answered. "I can see them very well, and the broken cannon, too."

The child looked at him with innocent surprise as she said: "You are joking now."

"No, my dear," replied the old man. "No. That was the last thing I ever saw on earth. There was a caisson exploded there just this side of that fence, and that was the last terrible picture I ever saw, and I have never got the picture of it out of my mind."

An Incident at Harper's Ferry.

Every boy in blue who ever got to that delectable place named above will probably recall the times he filled his canteen at the spring under the Odd Fellows' Hall. The writer of this squib often drank and was refreshed by its sparkling water. If memory serves him right, after a lapse of nearly a quarter of a century, there were at the Ferry in the spring of '62 the Twenty-eighth Pennsylvania, Tenth Maine, the Sixtieth New York Regiments Infantry, and the First Maine and Fifth New York Cavalry, and of these commands, more or less, the rank and file drank from this spring; but what caused the sudden outbreak of dysentery among the troops probably never was known to many of those who turned toes to the daisies in the hospital on the hillside. Across the village street lived a baker by occupation, and at heart a "Johnny" of the rankest sort. He poisoned that spring, and he did it well. The writer was one of his victims, but Surgeon Day of the Maine Tenth, didn't tell this until after Antietam's battle, in September, 1862, or that Johnny would have received his dues in full and a comfortable overcoat made of wood to boot.

THE LAKE SHORE A BUSY ROAD

Some Very Important Changes to Be Made Soon

(Press)

Some very important changes may be looked for in the near future affecting the station grounds of the Lake Shore railway. So far as the rumors seem to have any tangible foundation thus far it may be concluded that for the present all passenger trains on the Fort Wayne branch will stop on the north side of the main line right of way, and the large pile of crushed stone just south of the station building will be moved over to make a long and substantial platform for the convenience of passengers on the branch line. A new station with all modern improvements will no doubt be erected within the coming year, and present plans indicate that the location will be on the east side of Center street, just north of the main tracks. One reason for this belief is that it has already been decided to move the freight depot to the south of the crossing on the Fort Wayne branch.

It goes without saying that the company are anxious to secure property rights so as to build a Y from the branch north of the depot to the main line east of the depot, and it is rumored that the purchase recently of the Griffith cafe was with this view in mind, so that branch trains could be run down to the new location of the station to be built. All these changes have been considered for the purpose of adding the new tracks for the four track system. Whatever changes may be made will be to the interests of Waterloo as well as to the company and no one should place unnecessary obstructions in the way of completing the new plans.

Better Than Spanking

Spanking does not cure children of bed-wetting. There is a constitutional cause for this trouble. Mrs. M. Summers, Box W, Notre Dame, Ind., will send free to any mother her successful home treatment, with full instructions. Send no money but write her today if your children trouble you in this way. Don't blame the child, the chances are it can't help it. This treatment also cures adults and aged people troubled with urine difficulties by day or night.

Church People at Linton Secure Indictment of Missing Minister

Bloomfield, Ind., Dec. 7.—The Rev. Edward O. Tilburn, the runaway pastor of the Christian church of Linton, now has resting against him in the Greene circuit court an indictment charging him with embezzlement. Until three months ago Tilburn was the pastor of the Linton church and was held in highert regard by the congregation. Under his leadership the building of a new church was undertaken. Large sums of money for this purpose were subscribed, and Tilburn collected a considerable amount. One day he disappeared, telling certain of his parishoners that he had some business that called him to Chicago. At the same time Miss Mary Smith, the church organist, was missing and neither has been seen since. Tilburn took with him about $200 which he had collected for the new church. His whereabouts is a mystery. He left a wife and married daughter, the former now being with the latter at Butte, Montana.

Swift's Premium Calendar for 1910

Swtft's Premium Calendar for 1910 consists of four famous, old-time national songs: America; Home, Sweet Home; Old Folks at Home, and The Old Oaken Bucket.

Each of the four large sheets (9¾" x 15") beautifully illustrates in color, the homes and childhood scenes of the authors, also giving portrait, autograph and biography of the author, the history of the song, words of the song, and on reverse side a full piano music score with the words.

The first subject is the quaint old silver gray weather beaten cottafie at East Hampton, New York, the boyhood home of John Howard Payne, the author of "Home, Sweet Home," together with an autographed portrait, biograph ical description of the author's travels and origin of the song.

The next subject, Home of Samuel Francis Smith, Newton, Mass., author of "America," shows in beautiful colors the home of this famous author. Also an autographed protrait of him and a reproduction of the old Park Street Church, Boston, where the song was first sung in public, is shown.

The third subject is a colored reproduction of the Foster Homestead, near Pittsburg, Pa., birthplace of Stephen Collins Foster, author of "Old Folks at Home," and many other well known songs. An autographed portrait of him, and Christy, the famous minstrel who first sang "Old Folks at Home,' are also shown.

A colored allegorical illustration "The Moss-Covered Bucket Which Hung in the Well," taken from Samuel Woodworth's "The Old Oaken Bucket," complete this interesting series of American songs.

The calendar is now ready for distribution, and can be secured by sending either 10 Wool Soap Wrappers one cap from jar of Swift's Beef Extract 10 cents in stamps or coin, to Swift & Company, Calendar Department, Union Srock Yards, Chicago, Ill.

Obituary

The funeral of the late L. R. Ocker, was held from his home on W. South street yesterday afternoon. The funeral was under the auspices of the Lodge of Elks, the officers from South Bend being present. Rev. W. S. Howard, of South Bend, formerly of this city, assisted. The following obituary was read at the funeral which was held at the residence at 2 o'clock this afternoon:

On Sunday last, December 5, 1909, there passed out of this life, one of our best known and respected citizens in the person of Lorenzo Ocker. He was born at Wooster, Ohio, March 17, 1850, his parents being Silas and Frances Rogers-Ocker. With his parents he came to Butler, Indiana, when four years old, and during the remainder of his life he resided there and at other places in Indiana, for the past twenty years having been a resident of Plymouth, Indiana. He was married to Grace Kipfer, September 25, 1900, who survives him. He was the eldest of five children, and leaves his wife, three brothers and one sister to mourn his passing away, as well as hosts of friends here and at Butler, in which places he had lived most of his life.

The deceased went in and out among our people for two decades with a genial smile and a kind word for every one with whom he came in contact. No matter where he was, or under what adverse circumstances he labored, he never forgot to be a gentleman. He had no enemies. No one knew him but to love and respect him for his many good qualities of head and heart. As such he will be greatly missed and not soon forgotten by the large circle of friends he leaves behind him.

It is a beautiful thought when one passes out of this life to know that he will be remembered by his friends and that his faults whatever they may have been will be covered by the broad mantle of charity. In perpetuating such remembrance, no monument can be too magnificent; none too simple; and the humble gravestone in the country churchyard, speaks as eloquently as the elaborate tomb of the greatest of earth—each but the expression of the love and reverence of those left behind. It is proper therefore, that we, in whose hearts are treasured the virtues of our departed friend, should keep his memory green that it fade not from recollection. —Plymouth Tribune.

CURES REMOVE DOUBT ABOUT ECZEMA CURE

Read What Your Druggist Says About Oil of Wintergreen Compound

Druggist S. G. Stone submits the following to the readers of the HERALD:

For several years we have announced, with our recommendation, that we had found a positive cure for eczema; a simple skin wash, oil of wintergreen compounded with other healing ingredients.

Yet we know there are people right in this town who have eczema, and still have never tried this remedy.

We have, therefore, arranged with the D. D. D. Laboratories of Chicago for a special offer of a trial bottle at 25 cents instead of the $1.00 bottle as regularly sold.

We offer this trial bottle with our recommendation and assurance that just as soon as the patient washes his itching skin, this mild liquid will take the itch away instantly. S. G. Stone, Druggist, Butler, Ind.

A CORROBORATION

Of Interest to Butler People

For months Butler citizens have seen in these columns enthusiastic praise of Doan's Kidney Pills, by residents of this locality.

Would these prominent people recommend a remedy that had not proven reliable?

Would they confirm their statements after years had elapsed if, personal experience had not shown the remedy to be worthy of endorsement?

No stronger proof of merit can be had than cures that have stood the test of time.

The following statement should carry conviction to the mind of every Butler reader

Philip Oberlin, Route No. 1, Waterloo, Ind., says: "The principal symptom of kidney complaint in my case was a lameness across my back and sides. Whenever I caught cold, it settled in my kidneys and made my trouble worse. Finally I began taking Doan's Kidney Pills and they completely and permanently cured me. I have previously endorsed this remedy publicly and at this time I am glad to confirm my former statements."

For sale by all dealers. Price 50 cents. Foster Milburn Co., Buffalo, New York, sole agents for the United States.

Mrs. Northup, Quincy, Ill.

Mothers should be grateful to know of a remedy for their own stomach, bowel and liver troubles as well as for those of their children. Mrs. Alice Northup, of Quincy, Ill., after trying many methods is free to admit that the best one is Dr. Caldwell's Syrup Pepsin, which she uses herself and gives to her family. She believes no household should be without it. This grand laxative and tonic is absolutely guaranteed to do what is claimed, and if you want to try it before buying, send your address for a free sample bottle to Pepsin Syrup Co., 119 Caldwell Bldg., Monticello, Ill. It is sold by all druggists at 50c and $1 a bottle. 48-1m

SCROFULA

Scrofula disfigures and causes life-long misery. Children become strong and lively when given small doses of every day. The starved body is fed; the swollen glands healed, and the tainted blood vitalized. Good food, fresh air and Scott's Emulsion conquer scrofula and many other blood diseases.

Eat What

You want of the food you need Kodol will digest it.

You need a sufficient amount of good wholesome food and more than this you need to fully digest it.

Else you can't gain strength, nor can you strengthen your stomach if it is weak.

You must eat in order to live and maintain strength.

You must not diet, because the body requires that you eat a sufficient amount of food regularly.

But this food must be digested, and it must be digested thoroughly.

When the stomach can't do it, you must take something that will help the stomach.
